E Appeal by the appellant, Earl Russell, against a decision of the Court of Appeal ([1895] P. 315), so far as that decision set aside a finding of a jury that his wife, the Countess Russell, had been guilty of cruelty towards him and set aside a decree for a judicial separation.

The parties were married on Feb. 6, 1890. On Nov. 28 of the same year the wife filed a petition for judicial separation on the ground of her husband's cruelty. The husband, by his answer, denied the acts of cruelty imputed to him. The wife delivered particulars of the cruelty charged in the petition, in which she imputed to him the commission of an unnatural offence. The case was tried before BUTT, J., and a special jury in December, 1891, when the jury found that the husband had not been guilty of cruelty towards the wife, and the petition of the latter was, therefore, dismissed. On Dec. 8, 1891, there appeared in "The Hawk" newspaper an account of an interview between the wife and the editor, and it was alleged that she reiterated her charge against her husband, and intimated that, had an opportunity been afforded her, she could have established it. After the trial of her petition the wife refused to retract or apologise for having made such a charge. In April, 1894, the wife filed a petition for restitution of conjugal rights. The husband, by his answer, alleged that the petition had not been presented bona fide for the purpose of relief, and in a cross-petition for judicial separation said that the wife had been guilty of cruelty towards him in stating on oath that she believed that he had been guilty of the offence in question and in falsely and maliciously stating and publishing in writing that he had been guilty of the offence. The case came on for trial before POLLOCK, B., and a special jury, when the latter found that the wife had been guilty of cruelty towards the husband in making the charge, of which he was not guilty, and that her conduct and her correspondence subsequent to the first trial was not bona fide. POLLOCK, B., thereupon refused the wife's application for restitution of conjugal rights and granted to the husband a decree for judicial separation. On an appeal by the wife the Court of Appeal (LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ., RIGBY, L.J., dissenting) allowed the appeal and dismissed the husband's cross-petition, but they held that the wife's conduct was such as to debar her from any right to relief upon her petition for restitution of conjugal rights and dismissed that petition. Both the parties appealed to the House of Lords, but the wife withdrew her appeal, and the only question remaining to be decided was, whether A the wife had been guilty of legal cruelty towards the husband in accusing him of an abominable offence, persisting in the charge after a jury had acquitted him of it, and refusing to retract it.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

July 16, 1897. LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I think that it is necessary to consider the nature of the jurisdiction which your Lordships are here exercising. It is, since the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, that of the spiritual court. The courts to which an appeal lies have to place themselves in the position of the ecclesiastical C courts, and, except so far as the law has been altered by statute (a topic which requires separate treatment), to proceed on principles and rules as nearly as may be those on which the ecclesiastical courts acted previous to the passing of the statute.

In dealing with a question like the present, involving the relations of married D people towards each other, the spiritual courts always proceeded to act as having full jurisdiction over domestic life. They investigated the whole conduct of the spouses, and they undoubtedly recognised no middle course between an order for renewed cohabitation between them and an order for separation from bed and board. So far I entirely concur with the Court of Appeal. SIR GEORGE LEE, in 1755, in Holmes v. Holmes (1), laid down in express terms that nothing could be E offered in lieu of the decree that the wife should live with the husband, but such facts as would entitle her to a divorce in case she had brought a suit against him to be separated for cruelty. The case was appealed to the delegates, consisting of three of Her Majesty's judges, with FOSTER, J., at their head, and three learned civilians, and affirmed in the year 1757. That decision, so far as I know, in the interval between that date and the passing of the Act of 1857, has never been F qualified or questioned, and I am, therefore, of opinion that was the recognised law of the spiritual court down to the passing of the Matrimonial Causes Act; and SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL, in Burroughs v. Burroughs (2), and LORD PENZANCE, in Scott v. Scott (3), both held that the same rule applied since.

That some general principles actuated the judges who from time to time exercised the jurisdiction with which we are now dealing is true, but, nevertheless, it is G necessary to remember that each case was always one which raised a question of fact and degree. In dealing with such questions it is not always possible to disentangle what is decided as matter of law and what is decided as matter of fact, and it certainly cannot be laid down that whenever a divorce was refused that established the proposition that the cruelty charged, or even that of which some evidence was given, was not cruelty in point of law. The judge had in his own mind to determine H what and how much was established to his satisfaction, so that he could act upon it, and further, whether the facts deposed to were caused by provocation or were mere exceptional and rare instances of bad temper, or the like; and, in reviewing the numerous cases decided, it is impossible not to be struck with the extreme caution with which each case is expressly decided upon the facts held by the judge to be proved, and the relation of such facts to the whole married life of the parties I to the suit. In the view which the ecclesiastical courts took of the sanctity and perpetual obligation of the rights between the spouses it is intelligible enough that they should have sternly enforced the duty of continued cohabitation, except in such cases as, to use the phrase continually recurring, "when the facts show an absolute impossibility that the duties of the married life can be discharged." The phrase "impossibility" may, of course, be criticised, and it may be suggested that in no conceivable set of circumstances could such a phrase be justified; but I think that the argument may be retorted, since the circumstances which in the judgment

A of everyone would justify such a decree are not always—and, indeed, not often—those which will make a wife sue for separation. It is the experience of almost everyone that they have known cases where the wife has clung to the husband and prevented his being punished when he has habitually been guilty of the most cruel violence and ill-treatment; but the question is whether, against the will of the suffering spouse, matrimonial duties are possible in any intelligible sense when the conduct of either towards the other must excite feelings of horror and even loathing.

Applying such a phrase as I have quoted, which, as I say, recurs again and again in the opinions of very learned judges, to the ordinary course of domestic life, I think that it is a very apt phrase to express in a short form the principle upon which, as it appears to me, all the cases have been decided. Each case, of course, has disclosed its own circumstances, and in the mixed judgment, where facts have to be found and principles applied, it is not surprising that no legal definition of cruelty should have been laid down. The most common case has, of course, been physical suffering inflicted by a man upon his wife, but if the view contended for on behalf of the wife in the present case were correct it would be almost impossible to suggest that a man could ever sue for separation from his wife for cruelty. And even in what I have described as the commonest cases what infinite degrees there must be in the application of any rule except the rule which I have insisted upon as the one rule laid down expressly or impliedly in all cases. Questions of provocation of cruelty, of frequency in the conduct complained of, must come in review, and be the subject of averment; and, treated as questions of evidence, they were always subject to the calm judgment of a tribunal which knew how to discount the exaggerations of two angry people, and weigh the facts, and consider whether the facts, when so discounted, ought to prevent them from living together.

It appears to me, therefore, in reviewing what is said in the various cases that have been brought to our notice, that we ought carefully to note what facts the judges have assumed to be proved. I think that no better illustration of this can be found than in Paterson v. Paterson (4), decided in this House. LORD BROUGHAM himself carefully points out what he regards as having been proved. The noble and learned lord, in dealing with the facts, begins by saying (3 H.L. Cas. at p. 333) that, “not merely violence, but things far short of violence would justify the court in pronouncing a separation,” and, differing from LORD JEFFREY as to what was proved in the case, he gave as an illustration of what would justify the court in pronouncing a separation—

“the holding her up to scorn before her own servants; ordering her servants not only to disobey her, but to join in the chorus of hissing against their mistress, his wife, the mother of his children, as the head of his family.”

LORD BROUGHAM goes on to add these significant words (ibid.) :

H “When LORD JEFFREY puts that as a case I have only to answer it by saying that it is a very good case to support a proposition which I do not deny, and which nobody seriously denies, videlicet, that it is not necessary that there should be personal violence to constitute a ground for divorce.”

He then goes on to show (ibid. at pp. 333, 334) what he held to have been proved in the particular case, which consisted in

I “Withdrawing from her society, coldness towards her, leaving her apartment; telling her father that he will on no account ever renew his cohabitation with her, stating that he is wretched in consequence of his marriage—all things very painful to the feelings of the woman, all things very unhappy for the man, but anything rather than those things which LORD JEFFREY supposes in the case put.”

It may be that LORD BROUGHAM undervalued some of the evidence in that case; that he minimised the effect of some of the proof offered. It may be even that some of your Lordships would not agree with some of the conclusions which the noble Lord derived from the evidence. But it appears to me that that is nothing to the purpose. The principle of law that he lays down must be applied to the state of the facts, which he rightly or wrongly assumed to be proved, and nothing can be more emphatic than his negation of the proposition that personal violence, either threatened or inflicted, is an essential condition of the relief claimed by the petitioning spouse.

It is, to my mind, very obvious why no judge has ever yet attempted to propound an exhaustive definition of cruelty. If, as I have said, the spiritual court regarded married life as a whole, it would be absolutely impossible to lay down in the iron framework of a definition that which would constitute such cruelty as would necessarily justify separation; the questions of fact and degree would qualify almost any proposition that could be formulated; for example, a slight blow under great provocation, and on a single occasion during a long life, could hardly be suggested as a ground for separation, though upon that hypothesis, personal violence existed. On the other hand, it is possible to conceive a course of treatment which would make the continuance of the marriage bond, involving the obligation of the continued consortium, more terrible than the severest bodily suffering.

Whether the Court of Appeal were right or wrong in the middle course which their judgment suggests between a decree for restitution and a decree for judicial separation is not perhaps very material here in the actual form of the judgment which your Lordships will be asked to pronounce, since the lapse of the cross-appeal has rendered it unnecessary. But it cannot be doubted that the Act of Parliament under which the Court of Appeal considered themselves justified in arriving at the middle course made no difference in the law of what constituted legal cruelty, and I think that we must look at that question uninfluenced by difference of consequences that would follow if the law has been altered in respect of the remedy which a complaining spouse may obtain.

If one were to review each case in turn and extract from the judgments of the learned judges who have from time to time exercised the jurisdiction in question I think that it would be impossible to reconcile their judgments, even the judgments of the same judge, unless by giving a non-natural sense to the words used—e.g., attributing to an ecclesiastical judge the use of the word cruelty in a special sense in a judgment dealing with the question of cruelty in a cause of divorce a mensa et thoro. But one must read them by the light of a very familiar canon—that one must read a judgment, however general in terms, as having reference to the particular facts with which the judgment is dealing. As no judge has ever affected to define what cruelty is exhaustively, so no judge has, in my view, ever affected to prescribe what individual elements would go to make up cruelty; and in this case, if your Lordships' judgment should be against the appellant, it must go to the extent of saying that there was no evidence to go to the jury which justified them in finding that the course of conduct pursued by the respondent amounted to cruelty. If there was evidence for the jury then POLLOCK, B.'s, direction was right, and if his direction were wrong it would not justify a judgment for the wife unless, there being no evidence for the jury, POLLOCK, B., was wrong in leaving it to them. If the narrow proposition, that the cause of separation must be such as to cause injury to life or limb or health be sound, it is manifest that in many of the cases reported it would be ridiculous to suggest peril of life or limb, and the speculation as to health must become elastic according to the health and strength or feebleness of the particular person towards whom cruelty is exercised. I am not certain that, apart from all other questions which arise in this case, it would not be sufficient to say here that persistent accusations of the character which existed in this case, and made by a wife, might not be held to raise a reasonable apprehension of danger to health. There are few people who are familiar with the administration of the criminal law who will not acknowledge that madness and suicide are not uncommon consequences of persistent accusations of this character.

A It remains to consider whether, in this case, there was evidence for the jury of such cruelty as would have justified the court in pronouncing a decree of separation. It is a painful and a disgusting task to go through the evidence, but I think that I can summarise it sufficiently for what I have to say without entering into minute details. It is, perhaps, sufficient to describe the wife's conduct in this way. She persistently made accusations against her husband which, if believed, would drive
B him from human society; she made them where they would be most likely to be spread abroad, and, as, both in criminal and in civil jurisprudence, people are taken to intend the reasonable consequences of their acts, she must have contemplated that all who encountered her husband would regard him with loathing and horror. She did this, as the jury have found, without any belief in her abominable and disgusting accusations, and with a base motive of extracting better pecuniary terms
C from the husband whom she thus vilely slandered. I know that it has been said that the husband may safely disregard accusations which have been challenged to proof, and where the proof has signally failed. I regret to say that I cannot acquiesce in that suggestion. It is true that in this House and in every court where this question has been litigated Lord Russell has vindicated himself; but how many people are there who will have had the opportunity of judging from the evidence and giving it
D its true weight? How many people are there who take the trouble to investigate any case in which they have no personal concern, much less a case of this repulsive character?

For my own part I believe that an accusation of this kind is an incurable injury to the person against whom it is directed. If the jury were right upon the facts that they have found, can anyone conceive a court enforcing cohabitation with such a
E woman? I think that there can be but one answer to that question; and yet, as I have pointed out already, but for the Act of Parliament there can be no doubt, on the authorities, that the court, if deciding to refuse separation, would have been compelled, at all events before the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, both to decree cohabitation and enforce it by the imprisonment of the husband who should refuse to comply with the order. As I have already said, it is immaterial for the purposes
F of your Lordships' order whether the construction placed upon it by the Court of Appeal be right or wrong; but I must express my dissent from that construction. As the court itself declares, the Act in terms relates only to the consequences of not obeying a decree of restitution when made. It does not, I think, in any way refer to the grounds on which such a decree can be refused. It certainly does not in terms give the court any power to refuse a decree which it did not possess before
G the passing of the Act. It attaches certain consequences to the refusal to obey a decree, and gives certain rights to the injured spouse in lieu of the old authority which a court possessed to enforce obedience by attachment and consequent imprisonment. I confess that I am unable to follow the Court of Appeal in saying that since 1884, by necessary implication, the court must have power to refuse a decree for restitution where the result will be to compel the court to treat one
H spouse as deserting the other without reasonable cause contrary to the real truth of the case. It seems to me that this is reading into the Act of Parliament provisions which are not there, and giving a construction to provisions that are there which it is very difficult to imagine the legislature to have contemplated, the purport and meaning of the statute apparently being simply to provide a new remedy where a decree for restitution had been granted and where the person
I disobeyed the order. I cannot conceive that any alteration of the law was contemplated other than that which was expressly enacted. For these reasons I think that the order appealed from should be reversed and the judgment of POLLOCK, B., restored.

LORD WATSON.—Being in agreement with the majority of your Lordships that the decision of the majority of the Court of Appeal was according to law, I am unable to concur in the opinions which have been expressed by the Lord Chancellor.

The considerations which have led me to this conclusion are fully expressed in the judgment which will be delivered by LORD HERSCHELL, and, therefore, I think it unnecessary to occupy the time of the House in stating them in my own language. I beg leave to move that the order appealed from be affirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs. A

LORD HOBHOUSE.—The facts which led up to the still pending litigation between the Earl and Countess Russell in the Divorce Court admit of being stated in a moderate compass. B

The parties were married in February, 1890. Soon after the marriage they disagreed, and separated for a while. Then they lived together again till June, 1890, when they separated for the second time. Since that time they have never lived together. On Nov. 28, 1890, the countess presented a petition praying a judicial separation from the earl on the ground of his cruelty. She filed particulars in January, 1891, and there made allegations importing that the earl had been guilty of an odious crime in concert with one Roberts. At the hearing of the petition on Dec. 4 this charge was completely refuted, and it was withdrawn by the countess's counsel. The jury acquitted the earl of all the charges of cruelty, and the petition of the countess was dismissed with costs. On Dec. 8, 1891, there was published in a newspaper called "The Hawk" a statement made by the countess to the editor, the gist of which was that she had in her possession letters from the earl's relations supporting her charge, and that she did not produce them at the trial partly out of regard for his family, partly from misapprehension of the course of the proceedings. On Mar. 8, 1892, the countess commenced a written correspondence with the earl proposing a meeting. They never did meet, except once, accidentally, at a railway station; but the correspondence continued down to Dec. 16, 1892, when the earl refused to continue it, because the countess refused to withdraw charges which he said that she knew to be infamous and false. C

The correspondence may be summarised as follows. On the earl's side, he welcomed the overture of the countess as "the first signs of sorrow for the cruel wrong you have done me." He intimated a forgiving temper, but required her to state that she now disbelieved in her charges, and was sorry to have made them. If she would do that, he offered to meet her at the office of his solicitor. He refused then to make her an allowance for which she asked, partly on account of the expense which she had caused him and of claims she was still making, but mainly on account of her practical re-assertion in "The Hawk," and her continuance of, the charges which had been found to be false. To those positions the earl steadily adhered. The countess, on her part, said at first that people had poisoned her mind. But she persistently evaded either retraction or apology. On the contrary, as the correspondence proceeded, she dwelt more and more upon her charges, and upon the evidence in her hands, and upon her determination to bring them into publicity if sufficient provision was not made for her. She alleged that the people who poisoned her mind were the earl's relations, and that she had their letters in her hands, and that she would not apologise till they came forward to explain them. She wrote to the earl's uncle, Mr. Russell, saying that she had kept his letters back at the trial because he, with others, begged her not to repeat what they had said of the earl. She added: F
H

"But the time has now arrived when I must protect myself and vindicate my character in the eyes of the world. There are two things to be done: Either that you all recognise me publicly, or that I make all the family letters public for the world to draw its own conclusions." I

On Dec. 13 she wrote to the earl saying that she had a sworn affidavit about Roberts which would show that no responsibility rested with her; also that she had detectives' reports, meaning detectives by whom the earl was being watched, and

A that she ought not to be asked to apologise till the earl had seen those things, and had given a full explanation of all that he had been accused of. She wrote :

B “Before seeing you I quite meant something should be done, and thought the best plan would be to get a newspaper to print all the documents I hold in a pamphlet, and then, if the world thought an apology was due, to publicly apologise. . . . I might word the thing in this way, saying you refused to see me or support me till I apologise; then print everything to show my reasons for believing you guilty; then if the world thought I owed you an apology, to do it most willingly.”

On Dec. 19 she wrote to the earl's uncle, Mr. Stanley, to the same effect.

C Such was the condition of affairs when the present litigation began. On April 6, 1894, the countess brought a suit in the Divorce Court, praying for restitution of conjugal rights. That was met by the earl's counter-demand for judicial separation on the ground of her cruelty. Soon after the opening of the case the countess's counsel informed the court that he was instructed to say that the countess was satisfied that her charges about Roberts were without foundation, but that her belief in it was excused because she had written materials and letters in her possession.

D In the course of the evidence, however, it turned out that the countess had not, and never had, any of the materials which, through “The Hawk,” she invited the public to believe that she had to convict the earl, and repeatedly insisted on as her justification during the year 1892—not a letter, nor an affidavit, nor a detective's report, nor any incriminating statement from any of the earl's relatives. Her only

E pretence of justification was a letter of a very shameful character written to her as far back as the year 1890, before the first trial, conveying imputations against the earl which have been denied and disproved. In short the countess's representations of her case for charging the earl with crime, from December, 1891, when she used the editor of “The Hawk,” down to January, 1893, when she last wrote to Mr. Stanley, were a series of falsehoods, not abandoned till the present case was

F in course of trial. POLLOCK, B., who tried the case, instructed the jury that the countess was entitled to a decree for restitution unless the earl established a case of cruelty against her, and he put to them two questions. The first was whether the countess's conduct amounted to cruelty. The second was whether she had brought her charges since the first trial in good faith. On the question of cruelty he explained to the jury the doctrine of LORD STOWELL, in Erans v. Erans (5),

G pointing out that the criterion of danger was not alleged to cover all possible cases of cruelty, and that LORD STOWELL could not

“have had in his mind a case where either husband or wife was notoriously, openly, from week to week, from month to month, and from year to year, raising a charge against the other of the commission of a horrible offence, and that almost habitually.”

H He stated :

I “The complaint against her is that from that time, after the trial, although she had heard the verdict in favour of her husband at the close of the trial, she thenceforth wrote letters, made statements, pursued her husband, practically insisted on the same charge . . . not by one single act or one single letter, but by a continuance and persistence in conduct of that sort.”

The jury found that the countess had been guilty of cruelty. On the second question the learned judge asked the jury to say whether the countess did the acts in question honestly believing that she was making a charge that was true, or whether she did them not honestly believing that they were true, but for some ulterior purpose. On this the jury found that in her conduct and correspondence subsequent to the first trial she did not act bona fide. On these findings the court pronounced a decree of judicial separation.

The countess then moved the Court of Appeal to set aside that decree and to enter A a decree for her. On this appeal the learned judges differed in opinion. LOPES and LINDLEY, L.JJ., defined cruelty thus: "There must be danger to life, limb, or health, bodily or mental, or a reasonable apprehension of it." For brevity's sake, I refer to this definition afterwards as the doctrine of danger. Then, after carefully examining the authorities, the learned judges held that there was no evidence of B legal cruelty which ought to have been left to the jury, and, therefore, that the earl was not entitled to a decree for judicial separation. Then came the question whether the countess was entitled to a decree for restitution. The learned judges examined the authorities minutely to ascertain whether in the ecclesiastical courts there was any middle course between granting a decree for restitution or granting one for separation. And they found that, notwithstanding some startling results, there was none, and that such was the settled law down to the Matrimonial Causes C Act, 1857. After that Act it was urged that, as a new ground for separation and a new practice had been created, there was now a middle course. But SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL held otherwise, saying that it would be very dangerous to introduce a new rule (Burroughs v. Burroughs (2) ). But then the learned lords justices held that, indirectly, the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, has given to the court a power to refuse a decree for restitution which it had not got before. In 1857 desertion D without cause was introduced as a ground for judicial separation. In 1884 failure to obey a decree for restitution was made equivalent to desertion without cause.
It is impossible to say that the earl has deserted his wife without cause. But if a decree of restitution was made, and he failed to comply with it, the law would compel the court to say that. Therefore, they held that they were relieved from the necessity of making such a decree. RIGBY, L.J., held that legal cruelty had E been established; but as the rest of the court thought otherwise, the earl's petition for separation was dismissed. The countess's petition for restitution was also dismissed. Both parties appealed from this decision. The appeal of the countess has been withdrawn, so that her claim to restitution has been finally decided in the negative. The earl's appeal now stands for decision.

Such is the outline of the material facts which have caused this litigation, and F of the litigation itself. The question is whether the countess has been guilty of such cruelty as, according to the principles and rules on which the ecclesiastical courts acted down to the Act of 1857, which were continued in operation by that Act, requires the court to grant a decree of separation against her. Whether or no her petition for restitution has been rightly dealt with is a point which has not been argued on the present appeal, and I say no more about it except this—that I G hardly understand how the indirect effect of legislation on the subject of desertion without cause can stop short at the exact point of refusing a wife's petition for restitution, and, having gone so far, can fail to draw after it the established consequences of such a refusal. Assuming the present decision to be right, it is but an indirect and quite unforeseen effect of new law directed to another object. It may relieve the minds of judges from the terrible responsibility which would have H pressed on the ecclesiastical judges in ordering the husband to take back his wife.
But the legal question still remains the same as before. Would the ecclesiastical courts in 1857 have been bound to make such an order? For, as shown above, the law has been constant that, unless the husband can demand separation, the wife can demand restitution.

Starting from this point, I cannot persuade myself that any judge would have felt I himself so bound by precedent as to compel an innocent husband to take back a wife guilty of falsehood and persecution such as has characterised the conduct of the countess in this case. It appears to me that, though the doctrine of danger has sometimes been laid down by judges in terms more absolute than can be justified when the view is extended beyond the particular case under decision, on the whole they have been cautious not to attempt exhaustive definitions excluding other forms of cruelty which may occur in the infinite variety of human affairs. That

A violence and bodily danger are far the most common forms of cruelty accounts for the frequent repetition of the formulæ relating to such things. But we find not only judicial recognition that there may be other forms of cruelty, but judicial dicta and decisions taking a wider range, and quite irreconcilable with the rigid line by which it is now sought to confine the jurisdiction of the court.

The argument for the countess is rested by her counsel on a legal conception of cruelty said to be fixed by decisions of ecclesiastical courts. They must then take the ecclesiastical doctrines as a whole, and submit to be tried by the question whether the ecclesiastical courts would have granted a decree of restitution to the countess; and I go on to examine the authorities bearing on that question. Everybody begins the discussion of this subject by reference to LORD STOWELL's judgment in Evans v. Evans (5). The doctrine of danger was laid down by him with the caution to be expected from so judicial a mind. The case called for no other doctrine. Violence and danger were alleged by the wife. There were many other charges, some of them very trivial, and all too trivial to found relief upon. LORD STOWELL refuses to define cruelty. He lays down a wider principle than that of danger—namely, “an absolute impossibility that the duties of married life can be discharged;” and he points out that in a state of personal danger no duties can be discharged—that is, such a state falls within the wider category. “What falls short of this is” to be—shut out? No; but “to be admitted with great caution.” He intimates that there are cases, though few, in which what merely wounds the mental feelings is to be admitted as cruelty. Such is the cautious way in which the great judge handles this delicate topic. He is very far indeed from laying down the rigid line which is now insisted on. But LORD STOWELL could not find any case in which divorce had been granted except on the doctrine of danger. “The court,” he says, “has never been driven off this ground.” That is interpreted now as if he had laid down that it was not lawful for the court to take any other ground.

What, then, were the cases which he had in his mind when he intimated that danger was not an indispensable condition for divorce? For an answer to this question we are not left without light from LORD STOWELL himself. In Popkin v. Popkin (6), during a discussion on the admission of articles, he said (1 Hag. Ecc. at p. 768) that a husband's “attempt to debauch his own women servants was a strong act of cruelty, perhaps not alone sufficient to divorce, but which might weigh in conjunction with others as an act of considerable indignity and outrage to his wife's feelings.”

In D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar (7) the wife alleged that the husband spat upon her. In admitting the article, LORD STOWELL said: “Nothing can be more gross cruelty;” and he refers to a case in which a prohibition had been moved for, and was refused, “the only act of cruelty pleaded being spitting in the face.” The same disgusting subject is referred to by DR. LUSHINGTON, in Saunders v. Saunders (8), thus (1 Rob. Eccl. at pp. 561, 562):

“LORD STOWELL declares it to be legal cruelty. . . . In truth, however, does such a question require any authority at all? So gross a personal outrage would be insufferable even in the lowest grade of life.”

I He goes on to say that such an outrage is worse than threats of personal ill-usage. We have, then, two instances of ill-treatment affirmed by LORD STOWELL to be legal cruelty without any reference to the presence of danger. I am speaking of the quality of cruelty, or legal cruelty, which, as it is now asserted, cannot exist without danger. The amount necessary to support a decree for divorce is another question, to which I will address myself presently.

In 1825 Durant v. Durant (9) was decided. The husband had accused his wife of an intrigue with the children's tutor. SIR JOHN NICHOLL expressed himself thus (1 Hag. Ecc. at p. 770):

"Is there any woman who would not have considered an act of personal violence inflicted in passion, or even deliberately and maliciously, trivial and pardonable in comparison with this accusation—a charge made, not in the haste and error of the moment, but kept up and persevered in to the present time? If the case turned upon this point, I cannot say how I might feel compelled to decide; but if I were bound to leave the wife without remedy, I should deeply lament the hardship and cruelty of the law which demanded such a decision."

This is a clear opinion that such a charge has the quality of legal cruelty, though the circumstances of that case did not compel the judge to decide whether it was enough of itself to warrant a divorce. In 1828 Bray v. Bray (10) came before the same learned judge. The wife applied for the admission of an article supplying proof that her husband had falsely charged her with incest. The article was admitted, SIR JOHN NICHOLL saying :

"It is not, I think, possible to conceive cruelty of a more grievous character (except perhaps great personal violence) than the accusation by this husband against his wife."

It does not appear what was the result of the suit; but again the quality of legal cruelty was attributed to a false and foul accusation, without any reference to the doctrine of danger.

In 1847 DR. LUSHINGTON decided Saunders v. Saunders (8). This eminent judge is one who has stated the doctrine of danger most emphatically, as in Neeld v. Neeld (11). Indeed, it was said at the bar that he was the first to state the doctrine without qualification. Perhaps he meant nothing more than that, if violence was the ground assigned for divorce, it must be violence enough to raise the case of danger. If he meant more, it only shows in a striking way how impossible it is for those who lay down a rigid definition of cruelty to adhere to it when brought face to face with actions which everybody feels to be cruel, but which the definition will not fit. For he emphasises and enlarges on LORD STOWELL's treatment of spitting as in the category of legal cruelty, and as an outrage worse than threats of personal ill-usage. Yet no danger was there alleged in connection with the act; and the idea of danger was only arrived at by ulterior speculations of what might happen from a person who had done such a thing.

In 1850 the House dealt with the Scottish case of Paterson v. Paterson (4). The suit was by the wife for separation. The Lord Ordinary refused it. In his interlocutor he rested the judgment on this ground :

"In respect the libel is laid upon a series of insults and indignities said to have been offered by the defender to the pursuer unaccompanied with personal violence or any menace thereof," and that it is settled by authority that such a libel is not relevant. The Court of Session took a graver view of the allegations, and decided in favour of the wife. This House, in which LORD BROUGHAM was the only law lord who sat, thought that the Court of Session had misapprehended the facts of the case, and reversed their decision. But it refused to restore the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary as it stood, because it contained an erroneous recital of the law, and it ordered that recital to be struck out. That was the judicial act of this House—a decision that, at least according to the law of Scotland, it is not necessary for a wife to allege personal violence or any menace thereof in order to obtain divorce. LORD BROUGHAM's observations during the argument and in moving judgment show exactly what was in his mind. He states by way of hypothesis a case strongly resembling the present one—namely, that of a man continually falsely and publicly charging his wife with criminal conduct—and he says there is little doubt that the judicial dicta and opinions to which he had referred

"would ultimately assume the form of decisions, and that to such injurious treatment, making the marriage state impossible to be endured, and rendering

A life almost unbearable, the courts of the country would extend the remedy of a divorce a mensa et thoro."

His opinion seems to me to be quite in accordance with the doctrine of Evans v. Evans (5), and to express what from his other judicial utterances we may infer to have been the kind of case in LORD STOWELL'S mind when he spoke of cases not covered by the rule of danger.

B In Gale v. Gale (12), decided in 1852, the wife alleged that three days after her marriage her husband accused her of incest. SIR J. DODSON admitted the article, saying that the charge is not per se sufficient to constitute legal cruelty, but that it might be coupled with other averments. I take SIR J. DODSON to have meant by "legal cruelty" cruelty sufficient to warrant a divorce. He could hardly mean that there was no quality of cruelty in it such as the ecclesiastical courts would recognise. That would not only be contrary to Durant v. Durant (9) and Bray v. Bray (10), but, as I venture to think, contrary to common feeling and common sense, which must enter largely into questions of this nature. But it might be that such an accusation, though false, was made under circumstances palliative of the offence, and that if made in a fit of angry suspicion, if not persisted in or not blazoned forth to the world, or used as an engine of terror against the wife, it would not per se be considered as sufficient cruelty for a divorce. The report is silent as to all such circumstances: it mentions only the fact of a single wrongful accusation.

That is no authority against the separation sought in the present case. In 1858 occurred the first case in which a jury was employed to decide this question: Tomkins v. Tomkins (13). It was a suit by a wife, alleging personal violence and blows as constituting cruelty. SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL told the jury that he must direct them what acts constitute legal cruelty, and they must find whether the acts done were cruelty or not. He points out the difference between the position of a jury, who must decide quickly, and that of a judge, who can give time and thought to his decision, and shows the necessity for great caution and circumspection. On the merits of the case he refers at length to Evans v. Evans (5), and puts it to the jury that there must be bodily hurt, not trifling or temporary pain, or reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt. Thus SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL lays down the law after the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, on the same lines as existed before. The doctrine of danger which he laid down was applicable to the case before him, and sufficient for it. But his judgment in Milner v. Milner (14), which occurred in 1861, shows either that he never looked on that doctrine as sufficient to cover all possible events, or, if he meant to pronounce a rigid rule, that he, like DR. LUSHINGTON, found himself unable to maintain it in the face of gross cruelty, unaccompanied by danger. There the wife sued for divorce on the ground of adultery (which was proved) and cruelty. There was no substantial case of cruelty except for a single incident, on which, according to the report, the whole decision turned. The wife had followed her husband in the street, when he behaved to her in a way that led a bystander to think her a prostitute, and so to insult her. On this SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL said:

I "A man who has insulted his wife by treating her in the street like a common prostitute is guilty of at least as great an indignity as if he had spat in her face. I can imagine nothing more insulting or shocking to a woman of proper feeling than being so treated."

After referring to the evidence, he adds: "It is a case of the grossest and most abominable cruelty." Not a word is said about danger to the wife. The whole decision is rested on the outrageous insult by the husband.

In Pickard v. Pickard (15), decided in 1864 by LORD PENZANCE, the court admitted, in another direction, a wider range of considerations as justifying a decree for separation. The suit was by the husband, complaining of the violence and cruelty of his wife. It had been laid down by DR. LUSHINGTON in Furlonger v.

Furlonger (16) that, subject to distinctions necessarily founded on difference between the sexes, the same rule of danger must prevail, whichever was the complaining party, and that necessary protection was the foundation of all separation. LORD PENZANCE points out that the man can seldom be afraid of danger from his wife's violence. He says :

"I do not believe that his wife ever intended, or is likely, to do him serious harm by personal violence. Violence by the husband, and similar conduct by the wife, hardly deserves to be considered in the same identical light. . . . But if the physical effects of violence by the wife are less, the moral results are immeasurably greater. . . . Worse than all, the man is incited to the retaliation of force, perhaps driven to violence in self-defence. And if, holding its hands, this court refuses to relieve from the perils of provocation, what security is there for the safety of the wife herself?"

He decreed for separation on this ground. In Forth v. Forth (17), decided in 1867, the same learned judge applied the same principles.

It is certain that the doctrine of danger to life and limb means danger to the party complaining, and danger as proved by the acts of the party complained of. And yet in these cases an eminent judge has acted quite independently of this doctrine, and has decreed separation when there was no danger to the husband who asked for it, and no ground laid for suspecting any to the wife who resisted it. This he did, first, because of the greater moral effect of violence by the wife; and secondly, on a broad view of matrimonial relations, and of the possible consequences of continued cohabitation. Whether these considerations do not open a wider range to the discretion of the court than was before contemplated, may be doubted; but they certainly show that, in the opinion of LORD PENZANCE, there existed no such rigid rule as is now contended for, and that proof of danger is not a necessary condition of judicial separation. It was enough for him if the conjugal relations had been so shaken that further quarrels and remote consequential danger to either party might be inferred if cohabitation were resumed. If, then, the court is to speculate on the remote possibilities of exasperating conduct and retaliation by the injured party, when the case, as proved, contains no evidence of such things, such speculations are at least as allowable in the present case as in those before LORD PENZANCE. Indeed, they may find room in every case of bitter quarrel, and thus the supposed doctrine of danger would be reduced to a nullity.

With regard to the above-cited judicial opinions, it has been suggested that opinions expressed on the discussions of articles to the effect that acts not importing danger may be admitted to proof, do not amount to decisions that such acts are legally cruel, because acts not legally cruel may be brought in to aggravate the effect of acts which import danger, and, therefore, are legally cruel. Likewise, when acts not importing danger have been characterised as cruelty, and have been relied on to support decrees for divorce in cases where acts of personal violence have also been committed. It may be that in a question of conjugal conduct many acts not cruel, legally or at all, can be used to make it more probable that disputed allegations of cruel conduct are true. But in the cases cited the judges speak of the acts in question, not as proving that some other cruel act was committed, but as cruel in themselves; and I cannot find any trace of evidence that when speaking of cruelty they were not speaking of legal cruelty.

If an ecclesiastical judge, discussing a purely legal question on the admission of articles or otherwise, says of a man's conduct that it is cruel, it must be assumed that he means cruel in the sense of ecclesiastical law, unless he explains that he means something else. When SIR JOHN NICHOLL says of a false accusation of adultery that acts of personal violence are trivial compared with it, must he not mean that the two things are alike in their cruel nature, but that the false accusation is the more aggravated cruelty? When DR. LUSHINGTON says of spitting that it is worse than threats of personal ill-usage, must he not be taken to put the

- A two compared offences on a par in quality, and then to say which is the more heinous? In point of fact, the evidence of violence in Saunders v. Saunders (8) was not very cogent; and it is pretty plain that but for the act of spitting DR. LUSHINGTON would not have decreed a divorce. Of the most important of the charges, he only says that the husband's conduct was very offensive, and that there was some, not aggravated, violence. But when he comes to the spitting, he uses the strong
- B language cited above, and he makes it the main ground of his judgment. Certainly he adds that, "if taken singly," he need not say what the effect would be, and he couples it with the other misconduct. But suppose the husband were in the habit of spitting in his wife's face, and that in public, is it conceivable that either LORD STOWELL or DR. LUSHINGTON would have refused a divorce on that ground alone? Looking at their language, I cannot conceive it. Nor can I conceive that they
- C would not have put into the same category ruinous accusations by a wife, publicly made and repeated for a long time, though known to her to be false. Certainly, if judges have characterised acts as cruel, not meaning that they were cruel for legal purposes, they have used misleading language, such as we ought not to impute to them.
- D The conclusion which I draw from the authorities is that there is no rigid rule to exclude from the consideration of judge or jury a case where acts, cruel in their nature, are so grave as to destroy the foundations of conjugal life. I do not think that any rule can be laid down less wide than that of LORD STOWELL, "that the causes must be grave and weighty, and such as to show an absolute impossibility" (meaning, of course, a moral impossibility) "that the duties of married life can be
- E discharged." The fact that violence and personal danger are far the most common ground alleged for separation has led to repeated statements of the doctrine of danger in terms applicable and appropriate to those cases. But these are only one class of the broader category indicated by LORD STOWELL. It is said that we cannot define "impossibility" of discharging duties. Certainly not; any definition would be either so wide as to be nugatory, or too narrow to fit the ever-varying events of
- F human life. Neither can we define other terms applicable to human conduct, such as "honesty" for instance, or "good faith," or "malice"; or, to come nearer to the present case, "danger," "reasonable apprehension," "cruelty" itself. Such rudimentary terms elude a priori definition; they can be illustrated, but not defined; they must be applied to the circumstances of each case by the judge of fact, which in this case is a jury directed by a judge, and controlled, if erring in principle, by
- G the court above. I do not know any better or other way of deciding controversies on such points.

I fail, too, to share the apprehensions of danger and of litigation which have been urged on us as likely to occur unless the conduct of the Countess Russell is excluded from the category of legal cruelty. I think that the cases other than those of danger will still be few, and will still be admitted with great caution. Such a case

- H as the present is, as far as legal records go, unexampled, and we may hope that it will not soon be imitated. That the conduct of the countess was cruel in its nature, as men deem cruelty, I cannot doubt, nor that it was of singular enormity. Cases were put during the argument where there might be extreme cruelty without personal danger to the victim. One was that the wife of a tradesman might go about to ruin her husband by falsely telling his customers that he adulterated his goods.
- I Another was that the wife of a soldier might destroy his professional position by falsely stating that he was skulking at home when he ought to have been in the field. Would any court, it was asked, venture to compel the husband to receive into conjugal intercourse a disloyal wife who had abused her position and her presumed knowledge of his conduct to inflict the greatest of injuries on him? Such supposed cases are, to say the least, no worse than the present one. They are only illustrations of the impossibility of limiting cruelty by the doctrine of personal danger, and of the necessity of resort to the wider question whether it is conceivable that the duties of the married state can henceforth be discharged.

There are injuries worse than any personal danger. There are false accusations A of crime and dishonour, such as have driven men to despair and suicide. Earl Russell appears to be a man of robust fibre, who can bear up against slander. But that cannot alter the nature of his wife's acts, nor can the cruelty or malignity of them depend upon the nerves of her husband. It still remains true that after her injurious charge against him had been disposed of and openly withdrawn by her counsel, she renewed it; gave vent to it in a newspaper; invited people to B believe that she possessed written proofs of it, and had received written and oral incriminations of her husband from his nearest relatives; asserted that she had kept back her proofs at their entreaty, and out of compassion for them; and threatened further publication of these things from time to time during many months. All this is persistent falsehood and cruelty, with the object of inflicting C pain and terror; and it is not made any better if its ultimate object was to frighten the earl into making a pecuniary settlement satisfactory to the countess.

It must always be borne in mind that the defence of the countess rests wholly on the assertion that her conduct does not fall within a definition laid down by the ecclesiastical courts. It is that position which makes it necessary to examine minutely what the ecclesiastical courts have said and done in the few cases which D have presented features of cruelty apart from personal violence. Putting aside Gale v. Gale (12) as quite uncertain in sound, I cannot find that any one of the acts characterised as legal cruelty in the cases above cited has been alleged by any judge not to bear that character. All this was said and done by LORD STOWELL in Evans v. Evans (5), D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar (7), and Popkin v. Popkin (6); by SIR JOHN NICHOLL in Durant v. Durant (9) and Bray v. Bray (10); by DR. LUSHINGTON E in Saunders v. Saunders (8); by LORD BROUGHAM in Paterson v. Paterson (4); by SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL in Milner v. Milner (14); and by LORD PENZANCE in Pickard v. Pickard (15) stands uncontradicted. In it I find ample authority for saying that by the law of the ecclesiastical courts, cruelty has never been confined to cases of personal danger, but has been judged by the wider and more reasonable criterion expressed by LORD STOWELL—namely, whether or no conjugal duties have become F impossible between the litigant husband and wife. In my judgment, they have become impossible in this case, so far as impossibility can be predicated of human feeling and action. I think that the conduct of the countess transcends in cruelty and enormity the actual circumstances on which the various judicial opinions above cited have been given, and equals the hypothetical case put by LORD BROUGHAM. Therefore, I conclude that POLLOCK, B., put the case rightly to the jury, G and that his judgment founded on their verdict should be restored.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—The decision in this case turns solely upon the question whether the appellant has made out that Lady Russell was guilty of legal cruelty to him. The majority of the Court of Appeal has laid down a definition of legal cruelty H in the following terms :

“There must be danger to life, limb, or health, bodily or mental, or a reasonable apprehension of it, to constitute legal cruelty.”

As far as I can ascertain, no tribunal has before, in the history of our law, taken the I grave responsibility of express definition. As might be expected, each of the cases cited has shown special facts of its own, and a wide diversity of circumstances. As might also be expected, danger, and the apprehension of it, are found in the vast majority of cases; but judges have, on the whole, been careful not to lay down any exhaustive definition, although many of them have indicated that great caution would be requisite in seeking to go outside such a clear cause as danger. Thus LORD STOWELL, in Evans v. Evans (5), pointed out that what fell short of danger “should be admitted with great caution.” Again he said :

A "What merely wounds the mental feelings is in few cases to be admitted, when they are not accompanied by bodily injury, either actual or menaced."

I am not satisfied that he meant to lay down a definition (an idea he had disavowed) when he spoke of conduct showing "an absolute impossibility that the duties of married life can be discharged." I, on the whole, collect from LORD STOWELL's judgment that he regarded danger, or the apprehension of danger, as what might be anticipated, as a rule, to be found in cases where cruelty was charged, and that if any charges outside those clear limits were alleged, they should be regarded as exceptional and "admitted with great caution."

The words of this great judge in subsequent cases would support the view that he did not regard himself as having laid down any precise or exhaustive definition of cruelty in Evans v. Evans (5). Thus, in Popkin v. Popkin (6) he said (1 Hag. Ecc. at p. 768) that a husband's attempt to

"debauch his own woman servants was a strong act of cruelty, perhaps not alone sufficient to divorce, but one which might weigh, in conjunction with others, as an act of considerable indignity and outrage to his wife's feelings."

The word "perhaps" shows how carefully he shrank from any exhaustive definition, and also indicated the "great caution" which he felt should be applied in reference to charges of cruelty other than danger, or the apprehension of it. Again, in D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar (7) he admitted an article with the allegation that the husband spat on his wife, saying that "nothing can be more gross cruelty." Of course, it has to be borne in mind that an article was admissible if it disclosed relevant facts, and that it was not so essential that each article need contain a statement sufficient to justify a divorce. A great ecclesiastical judge, however, would not use the words "gross cruelty" without having present to his mind the grave judicial significance that might be attached to them. This would seem the more probable from his referring, without disapproval, to the case in HETLEY [Cloborn v. Cloborn (18)], where "the only act of cruelty" pleaded was spitting in the face. I am not concerned to discuss this case in HETLEY, or the accuracy of the reference to it. The important point is to note LORD STOWELL's view of a case where spitting in the face was the "only act of cruelty." In the later case of Saunders v. Saunders (8) DR. LUSHINGTON refers to D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar (7), and the charge of spitting in the face: "LORD STOWELL declares it to be legal cruelty. . . . Does such a question require any authority at all?"

The judgments of SIR JOHN NICHOLL in the different cases cited are not entirely consistent, and would go to show that he had not present to his mind that there was, or could be, any clear, distinct, or exhaustive definition of cruelty. In the case of Westmeath v. Westmeath (19) he said (2 Hag. Ecc. Supp. at p. 72): "There must be ill-treatment and personal injury, or the reasonable apprehension of personal injury." But there he had been commenting on cases where those elements were present. In Durant v. Durant (9), so much referred to, where a false and unfounded charge of misconduct had been brought against a blameless wife, SIR JOHN NICHOLL said (1 Hag. Ecc. at p. 769):

"Here is not cruelty which would support a sentence propter sævitiam, but here is an act which might be pleaded as such in conjunction with other circumstances."

II But again he said in the same case:

"If the case turned upon this point, I cannot say how I might feel compelled to decide; but if I were bound to leave the wife without a remedy, I should deeply lament the hardship and cruelty of the law which demanded such a decision."

These last words prepare one for his decision, three years later, in Bray v. Bray (10), where, in admitting an article that a husband had falsely charged his wife with incest, he said:

“It is not, I think, possible to conceive cruelty of a more grievous character (except, perhaps, great personal violence) than the accusation of this husband against his wife.” A

I think it manifest that this learned judge, having regard to his language in these three cases, cannot be cited as an authority who would have accepted the definition of the Court of Appeal in this case.

Paterson v. Paterson (4) is of the highest significance in this controversy, having regard to the directness of the decision and the fact that it was the judgment of this House. Speaking with great deference, I do not think (as I have said in a former case decided by your Lordships, Mackenzie v. Mackenzie (20) ) that I should myself have arrived at the same conclusion as LORD BROUGHAM on the facts, but I feel bound to acknowledge the force of the decision of this House on the question of law decided. He laid down in the most absolute terms : B

“That the ground of the remedy is confined to personal violence is not the law of England, and certainly not the law of Scotland. The law is nearly, if not altogether, the same in the two countries. It is true that the law of England either requires actual injury to the person, or threat of such injury.” D

LORD BROUGHAM, in the order of your Lordships' House, inserted the most distinct repudiation of the view of the Lord Ordinary, that nothing but personal violence, or the menace of it, would suffice as a ground of divorce. It is not suggested that in this respect there is any difference between the law of England and the law of Scotland. Putting it at the lowest, no one can rely upon this decision of your Lordships' House as giving any warrant for adopting the absolute and unqualified definition found in the judgment of LOPES, L.J. E

The two decisions of SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL, so much cited, after the Act of 1857, do not appear entirely to harmonise, and can only be reconciled on the ground that he confined himself in each to its special facts, and was not thinking in either of laying down any general principles or attempting the difficulty from which so many other great judges had shrunk, of formulating a definition. In Tomkins v. Tomkins (13), which was a case where considerations of personal violence and menace and their degree were present, this learned judge, in instructing the jury, said : “Danger of life or limb or health has continued, in substance, the rule upon which the courts have acted.” His judgment in Milner v. Milner (14) shows that he could not have intended in the earlier case to have laid down any general rule that would stand the test of being applied to all facts. It was a suit for divorce on the ground of adultery and cruelty. The charge of cruelty turned upon the fact that the wife had followed the husband in the street, when he behaved to her in such a way that led bystanders to think her a prostitute and to insult her. The words of SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL as to this were clear and emphatic : F

“A man who has insulted his wife by treating her in the street like a common prostitute is guilty of at least as great an indignity as if he had spat in her face. . . . It is a case of the grossest and most abominable cruelty.” H

It is manifest the judge who used these words was not prepared for the definition of the Court of Appeal. LORD PENZANCE, in Pickard v. Pickard (15), somewhat extended the area of consideration in holding that the court should guard against “perils of provocation.” Kelly v. Kelly (21) shows that the jurisdiction was not limited to personal violence, and the relief would be given where conduct undermined health. I

All this goes to show the necessary elasticity of the term “cruelty,” and how impossible it is to lay down any safe or sufficient definition of cruelty. Can relief be made in all cases dependent upon health? Is a person whose health suffers from the strain of persecution, malevolence, and worry to be given relief, and another person be denied it under circumstances of greater malignity and atrocity, merely because his constitution was better and his courage more robust?

A I adopt to the fullest extent the judgment of LORD STOWELL in Evans v. Evans (5), and think (i) that there must be "grave and weighty causes" for a finding of cruelty; (ii) that "what merely wounds the mental feelings is in few cases to be admitted;" (iii) that what falls short of personal danger "is with great caution to be admitted." He indicated what, according to the general experience of mankind, would be the general rule, taking care to use words which would not exclude

B from special consideration exceptional cases when there was "no bodily injury, either actual or menaced," but using warning words as to the necessity in such cases of "great caution."

Are the facts of this case special and exceptional, and such as should be recognised as cruelty, even after the greatest caution? What are these facts? The cruelty alleged and proved consists of false charges of abominable and infamous criminal

C offences put forward in the most deliberate way in judicial proceedings by the wife, withdrawn by her counsel in open court, re-asserted by her with a view to publication in the Press, and put forward and persisted in by her in a long correspondence under circumstances which a jury has found not to be bonâ fide. She might have let the withdrawal stand, and then I should not concur in the charge being subsequently

D treated as cruelty. But in "The Hawk" and in correspondence prolonged over years she has put forward this odious charge, when it is not suggested that she believed in it, and when a jury has found that she was not acting bonâ fide. Accepting, as we are bound to do, the findings of the jury, the books do not disclose a cause "more grave and weighty," a charge more ruinous, an accusation more

E calculated to destroy his life, his prospects, and his friendships, and make the husband an outcast and a pariah. In the words of LORD STOWELL, is it not equal to the "strong act of cruelty" in Popkin v. Popkin (6)? In the language of the same great judge, is it not equal to the "gross cruelty" of D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar (7)? To use the words of SIR JOHN NICHOLL, in Bray v. Bray (10), can anyone conceive cruelty of a more "grievous character"? In the words of SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL, in Milner v. Milner (14), is it not "a case of the grossest and most abominable cruelty"? In attempting to lay down a definition, the

F Court of Appeal have departed from the cautious example of LORD STOWELL, while in its terms they have departed from the judgment of LORD BROUGHTAM. To my mind, the general rule and practice with its necessary qualifications have been wisely laid down by LORD STOWELL, and in the records of our courts the "great caution" which he inculcated has been applied. It is, I venture to think, dangerous now for the first time to attempt to frame a definition of cruelty, and it may

G in some cases lead to the exclusion of "grave and weighty causes," and, therefore, to much hardship to some who with all due caution might be admitted to relief. In my opinion, the judgment of the Court of Appeal was wrong, and I concur with the Lord Chancellor that the appeal should be allowed.

H LORD HERSCHELL.—The appellant in this case seeks a judicial separation from his wife on the ground of her cruelty. It must be taken on the findings of the jury, that the wife alleged, without cause, that the appellant had been guilty of an abominable offence, and that she persisted in asserting it without an honest belief in its truth. The sole question is whether this amounts to cruelty in point of law so as to entitle the appellant to a judicial separation.

I The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, under which the existing Divorce Court obtained its jurisdiction, provides by s. 22 that in all suits and proceedings other than proceedings to dissolve any marriage the court shall proceed and act and give relief on principles and rules as nearly as may be conformable to the principles and rules on which the ecclesiastical courts had theretofore acted and given relief [see now Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 32, s. 103 (1)]. The question, therefore, to be solved is: What were the principles and rules upon which the ecclesiastical courts acted in granting a divorce a mensa et thoro on the ground of cruelty prior to the year 1858? [The Act of 1857 came into force on Jan. 1, 1858.] It was conceded by the learned counsel for the husband, A and is, indeed, beyond controversy, that it was not every act of cruelty, in the ordinary and popular sense of that word, which amounted to sævitia, entitling the party aggrieved to a divorce, but that there might be many wilful and unjustifiable acts, inflicting pain and misery, in respect of which that relief could not be obtained. When once this is conceded, it obviously becomes necessary to ascertain what was meant by sævitia, or cruelty, in the ecclesiastical courts, when regarded B as a ground for divorce. It was contended that it is impossible exhaustively to define "cruelty." Whether this be so or not, it is manifestly necessary to determine what elements were treated as essential to the constitution of the sævitia, or cruelty, which entitled to a divorce.

It has been usual, whenever this question has arisen for consideration, since the year 1790, to commence with a reference to the statement of the law to be found C in LORD STOWELL's judgment in Evans v. Evans (5), decided in that year. He said (1 Hag. Con. at p. 37):

"What is cruelty? In the present case it is hardly necessary for me to define it, because the facts here complained of are such as fall within the most restricted definition of cruelty; they affect not only the comfort, but they D affect the health and even the life of the party. This, however, must be understood—that it is the duty of the courts to keep the rule extremely strict. The causes must be grave and weighty, and such as to show an absolute impossibility that the duties of married life can be discharged. In a state of personal danger no duties can be discharged, for the duty of self-preservation must take place before the duties of marriage, which are secondary both in E commencement and obligation; but what falls short of this is with great caution to be admitted."

The learned judge then discusses the effect of words which wound the mental feelings, whether natural or acquired, and afterwards proceeds thus (ibid. at pp. F 39, 40):

"They only show what is not cruelty. . . . But if it were at all necessary to lay down an affirmative rule, I take it that the rule cited by Dr. Bever from CLARKE and the other books of practice is a good general outline of the common law upon this subject. In the older cases of this sort, which I have had an opportunity of looking into, I have observed that the danger of life, limb, or health, is usually inserted as the ground upon which the court has proceeded G to a separation. This doctrine has been repeatedly applied by the court in the cases that have been cited. The court has never been driven off this ground. It has been always jealous of the inconvenience of departing from it, and I have heard no one case cited in which the court has granted a divorce without proof being given of a reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt. I say an apprehension, because assuredly the court is not to wait till the hurt is H actually done."

It has been contended that the test of cruelty which LORD STOWELL here supplies is whether the circumstances are such as to show an absolute impossibility that the duties of married life can be discharged, and that the condition of personal danger produced by violence or threats is given only as an illustration, and is but one I of many circumstances which would equally satisfy the test. I shall have presently to discuss the value of the suggested test. But I remark, in the meantime, that I am unable thus to interpret LORD STOWELL's language. If the view contended for be correct, what does he mean by speaking of the danger to life, limb, or health, as the ground for a separation as a "doctrine repeatedly applied by the court," or by the assertion that the "court has never been driven off this ground"? The language used obviously implies that attempts had been made to induce the court on some other ground than this to afford relief for alleged cruelty. Why had

A the court refused to be driven off this ground if it was but one of several which were comprehended within the broad general rule said to be enunciated as the test of cruelty?

B The next authoritative exposition on the subject of cruelty is to be found in Westmeath v. Westmeath (19). In his judgment in this case, in 1826, SIR CHRISTOPHER ROBINSON spoke of danger to life, limb, or health, as "the ordinary criteria of legal cruelty in these courts." And in a later part of the same judgment he used this language: "On an attentive comparison of all the cases that have been alluded to, I think I may affirm that the ecclesiastical courts have hitherto been uniformly strict in requiring proof of actual injury or of real apprehension of injury as it may affect the safety or health of the person to justify a divorce on the ground of cruelty." It is scarcely possible to imagine language more explicit than this; and the words of SIR JOHN NICHOLL, when, in the following year, he had to consider Westmeath v. Westmeath (19), on appeal, are not less so. He sets himself to inquire what is "the law that applies" to a charge of cruelty, and propounds the question thus: "What constitutes cruelty in the view of the law?" After quoting from LORD STOWELL's judgment in Evans v. Evans (5), he proceeds:

D "So in Harris v. Harris (22)—'There must be something that renders cohabitation unsafe, or is likely to be attended with injury to the person, or to the health of the party.' Again, in Waring v. Waring (23) the usual principles require that such complaints should be supported by proof of violence and ill-treatment endangering, or, at least, threatening, the life, or person, or health of the complainant. The same doctrine is held in the case of Holden v. Holden (24)."

E After quoting some passages from the judgment in that case, he adds:

"These, then, are the principles by which these courts have been governed, and according to which it is my duty to decide. There must be ill-treatment and personal injury, or the reasonable apprehension of personal injury."

F It is to be observed that these observations of SIR JOHN NICHOLL are not merely interposed in the discussion of the facts of the particular case. Before dealing with these he considers what is the law he is to apply, and seeks an answer to the question what is the nature of the cruelty which will justify a decree of divorce.

G Again, in Neeld v. Neeld (11), a few years later (1831), DR. LUSHINGTON had to decide whether, assuming the facts stated in the libel to be true, a case of cruelty was established. He said (4 Hag. Ecc. at pp. 265 and 271):

H "The main test which I must apply is whether the facts with which Mr. Neeld is now charged are of the nature and description to satisfy my mind that cohabitation can no longer subsist between the parties without personal danger to Lady Caroline Neeld. . . . In these suits the species of facts most generally adduced are, first, personal ill-treatment, which is of different kinds, such blows, or bodily injury of any kind; secondly, threats of such a description as would reasonably excite in a mind of ordinary firmness a fear of personal injury. For causes less stringent than these the court has no power to interfere and separate husband and wife; it is necessity alone which has conferred on the ecclesiastical courts that power, and in regard to self protection alone must the exercise of that power be guided. . . . Short of personal violence or reasonable apprehension of it, I have no power to interfere."

I Trying the case by these tests the learned judge refused relief, although the libel disclosed conduct on the part of the husband towards his wife of no small outrage and indignity.

I turn now to the authorities which are supposed to favour a less stringent exercise of the jurisdiction of the courts. In some of these cases the question which had to be decided was the admission of articles, and it must be borne in mind that it was the practice in the ecclesiastical courts to plead evidence. Each article did not necessarily contain a statement of facts sufficient to warrant the decree asked for. It was admissible if it disclosed relevant facts bearing on the charge which was the foundation of the suit. And it would seem that any act of cruelty, in the popular sense of that term, would be admissible as throwing light on and proper to be considered in connection with more serious charges. It is clear, therefore, that the decision that an article was admissible as containing a statement of facts relevant to a charge of cruelty can by no means be regarded as deciding that the facts so stated would of themselves have justified a divorce. It is further to be observed that, especially in dealing with the admission of articles, the judges have not unfrequently, when speaking of acts as "cruel," used that word in its popular sense, and not as indicating that the acts were cruel in the legal acceptance of the term, that is to say, such as would entitle to a divorce. An instance of this is to be found in Popkin v. Popkin (6), where the libel charged the husband with habitually frequenting brothels and attempts to debauch his women servants in his own house. LORD STOWELL said (1 Hag. Ecc. at p. 768):

"The attempt to debauch his own women servants was a strong act of cruelty, perhaps not alone sufficient to divorce, but which might weigh, in conjunction with others, as an act of considerable indignity and outrage to his wife's feelings."

Here it is obvious that LORD STOWELL must have used the word "cruelty" in its popular and not in its legal sense, for it would be nonsense to speak of cruelty in the latter sense as "perhaps not alone sufficient to divorce."

Some observations of LORD STOWELL in D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar (7) have been much relied on. In the course of a discussion as to the admissibility of the articles in that case, he is reported to have spoken as follows (1 Hag. Ecc. at p. 776):

"The article proceeds to state minute acts. I think they may be better stated in a general way; they throw levity on the business when pleaded, and are more proper to come from the witnesses. As to spitting at her, nothing can be more gross cruelty, and there is a case in HETLEY [Cloborn v. Cloborn (18)] in which a prohibition was denied, the only act of cruelty pleaded being spitting on the face, and that was adjudged sufficient."

It is to be remembered that the learned judge was here dealing only with the admissibility of the articles. They contained ample statements of acts of undoubted cruelty. When he says that spitting at the wife was "gross cruelty," he was, I am satisfied, using that word in its popular and not in its technical sense. It was quite unnecessary for him to consider whether the act would of itself warrant a divorce; all that he had to decide was whether it was a relevant statement. It is impossible to suppose that the learned judge intended, in the year 1794 (the date of the decision in D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar (7)), in using the language he did, to depart from the ground from which, only four years before, he said the court had never been driven, and this, too, without making any reference to his former exposition of the law, or giving any reason for a change of view, or for taking a new departure.

I cannot but doubt whether the report can be regarded as accurate, for, if it be so, the observation attributed to the learned judge with reference to Cloborn v. Cloborn (18) is very inaccurate. The only act of cruelty pleaded was not "spitting on the face." The complaint was "that he gave her a box on the ear and spat in her face, and whirled her about and called her a damned whore." It is not easy to disentangle the opinion of the court from the arguments of counsel. But it is clear that the prohibition was not denied, because "spitting on the face" was adjudged a sufficient allegation of cruelty. The ground on which the prohibition was claimed was that the husband "chastised his wife for a reasonable cause by the law of the land, as he might, which they denied, and said that they had jurisdiction

A in these matters de sævitia." The result is stated thus: "But the plaintiff they advised to tender a justification, and, if they refused it, then to move for a prohibition." In the course of the report the following passage occurs: "We cannot examine what is cruelty or not. And certainly the matter alleged is cruelty, for spitting in the face is punishable by the Star Chamber." The reason is noteworthy. B It can hardly be contended that this is a test of cruelty sufficient in law to warrant a divorce. And the observation that it was for the ecclesiastical court, and not for the courts of common law, on an application for a prohibition, to determine what was cruelty appears perfectly sound.

It is true that in Saunders v. Saunders (8), in 1847, where the husband was charged with spitting in his wife's face, DR. LUSHINGTON, after referring to the doubts which had been cast in the course of the argument on the authority of Cloborn v. Cloborn (18), said that there could be no more competent judge on such a question than LORD STOWELL. But DR. LUSHINGTON did not decide the case on the authority of LORD STOWELL's supposed decision or dictum in D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar (7). He said (1 Rob. Ecc. at p. 562):

"I will look at such behaviour, however, even with more technical strictness. D Is it possible to imagine that when a husband has proved himself so utterly insensible to all those feelings which he ought to entertain towards his wife, so brutal, so unmanly, that he would, when his passion was excited, restrain himself within the bounds of the law, that his wife would be safe under his control? Threats of personal ill-usage have been deemed sufficient to justify a separation. I am of opinion that such an outrage as this is more than equivalent to a threat, for it proves a malignity of feeling which would require only opportunity to show itself in acts involving personal danger, but never surpassing in cowardly baseness." E

It is needless to discuss this view of the facts, but it is a clear recognition that "technical strictness" required that the court should be satisfied that personal danger to the petitioner was involved before it could grant a divorce. It was only to be expected that this view should be taken by a judge who had, a few years before, in Neeld v. Neeld (11), so clearly and unequivocally defined the conditions requisite to justify a divorce. F

Another dictum much relied on is found in the report of Bray v. Bray (10), which came before SIR JOHN NICHOLL in 1828. That, again, was a question of the admission of articles. The learned judge said (1 Hag. Ecc. at p. 167): G

"The third article is intended to establish not merely a declaration of the husband, but a solemn affirmation on oath of a part of the charge brought against him—viz., asserting, before and after the birth of the child, that that child was not his, but the fruit of an incestuous connection between Mrs. Bray and her uncle. Though that may be admitted in the husband's answer, the wife is H not bound to depend on the chance of that admission. It is not, I think, possible to conceive cruelty of a more grievous character (except, perhaps, great personal violence) than the accusation made by this husband against his wife."

I may observe that your Lordships were furnished with the proceedings in the case, and that the articles contained charges of undoubted cruelty. It is clear to my mind that SIR JOHN NICHOLL here used the word "cruelty" in its popular and not in its technical sense. I have formed this opinion not merely because the former is the sense in which the word is usually and properly used, when the question in controversy is the admission of articles, but also from the considerations to which I will now advert. I

Three years earlier the same learned judge had, in Durant v. Durant (9), to consider what conduct would revive condoned adultery. The husband in that case had ordered his doors to be shut against his wife, a mother with twelve living children, and made and persisted for years in an utterly unfounded charge of adultery against A her. After intimating that he was inclined to hold that cruelty would revive condoned adultery, the learned judge said (1 Hag. Ecc. at p. 769) :

He thus draws a sharp distinction between acts which may be pleaded as cruelty in conjunction with other circumstances and those which are of themselves sufficient to support a sentence, and he places an utterly unfounded charge of adultery persistently made in the former category. Reliance has been placed on a passage in the same judgment, where the learned judge used the following language (ibid. at p. 770) :

This passage, however, had reference to the question whether the acts of the husband, even though not amounting to cruelty which would warrant a divorce, were sufficient to revive the adultery which had been condoned. This was the point on which the learned judge reserved his opinion, and not on the question whether the acts would justify a sentence of divorce, on which, as I have shown, he had distinctly expressed an opinion in the negative.

It was only the year before SIR JOHN NICHOLL's observations in Bray v. Bray (10) that he gave the elaborate exposition of the law of cruelty in Westmeath v. Westmeath (19), from which I have already quoted. He cannot have intended, in the following year, by the language under discussion, to indicate a different view of the law. Moreover, it seems clear that he was not so understood by those who were conversant with the practice of the ecclesiastical courts, and with the distinction between the acts which might be pleaded as cruelty in the articles and those which would support a divorce. For in Gale v. Gale (12), decided in 1852, the counsel who were supporting the libel argued that where substantial acts of cruelty were alleged, as in that case, it was allowable to plead also matters which wound the feelings, and that a false charge of incest was a grievous aggravation of cruelty. SIR JOHN DODSON, in giving judgment, said, “Undoubtedly the charge of having committed incest is not, per se, sufficient to constitute legal cruelty, but coupled with other averments of a substantial character, I think, on the authority of the cases cited, that charge may form part of a libel.”

Much importance has been attributed, and I cannot but think undue importance, to some remarks made by LORD BROUGHAM in delivering his opinion in this House in Paterson v. Paterson (4). It will be well, first, to notice what was decided in that case. The Lord Ordinary had embodied in his interlocutor the view that nothing but personal violence or the menace thereof would suffice as a ground for divorce. This was decided to be an erroneous statement of the law. Beyond this nothing was determined, except that the petitioner had not established a case of cruelty, although it was shown that her husband shortly after the marriage had withdrawn from her society, and avoided her, was constantly to be found in his sister's company, declared that he would never renew cohabitation with his wife, refused to allow her family to associate with her, and threatened them with violence if they attempted to do so. But in the course of his speech LORD BROUGHAM, after saying

A that there was no case which went further than LORD STOWELL went in the passage I have quoted from Evans v. Evans (5), proceeded to say (3 H.L. Cas. at p. 328) :

B “but, nevertheless, there is so much dictum, there are so many opinions or inclinations of opinion ventilated which have a tendency to go further, that if a case were to arise such as the ingenuity of some of the learned judges in Scotland in this case supposed, I have very little doubt that we should find the rule considerably extended, and that that which now only rests upon opinions more or less distinctly mooted and ventilated would assume the form ultimately of a decision—namely, that if the husband, without any violence or threat of violence to the wife, if the husband without any maltreatment endangering life or health, or tending or leading to an apprehension of danger to life or health, C were to use mere tyranny, constant insult, vituperation, scornful language, charges of gross offences utterly groundless, charges of this kind made before her family, her children, her relations, her friends, her servants, insulting her in the face of the world and of her servants, calling upon those servants to join in those insults, and to treat her with contumely and with scorn, if such a case were to be made out, or even short of such a case, which would make the marriage state impossible to be endured, which would make life itself almost impossible to be endured, then I think the probability is very high that the consistory courts of this country would so far relax the rigour of their negative rule, at present somewhat vague, as to extend the remedy of a divorce a mensa et thoro to a case such as that.”

E I may observe, in passing, that I can hardly conceive conduct more likely to affect the health of a woman than that described by LORD BROUGHAM.

The language I have quoted is, it has been urged, a declaration by the noble and learned Lord that the true test in point of law, is not whether there is injury or danger of injury to person or health, but whether it is possible, under the circumstances, that the marriage state can be endured. It seems to me, on the contrary, F to be a clear recognition of the fact that, ever since the ecclesiastical courts had exercised the jurisdiction of divorce, down to the year 1850 (when LORD BROUGHAM was speaking), the test of danger to person or health had always been applied. And it is no more than a speculation by LORD BROUGHAM, who cannot be regarded as specially an authority on the ecclesiastical law, as to whether the courts would not, in the case he put, relax the rigour of the rule on which they had theretofore acted. In truth I cannot regard those remarks as of any weight at all towards the elucidation of the question: What is the nature of the acts which warrant a divorce on the ground of cruelty? I should have thought, indeed, that the marriage state might have been truly said not to be “endurable” to use LORD BROUGHAM’s word, and the discharge of marriage duties impossible, if those be the tests, under the treatment to which the appellant, in the case with which LORD BROUGHAM was dealing, subjected his wife, and yet her petition for relief was of no avail. G

H One argument I ought to notice before I review the authorities. The court, it was said, could only refuse restitution of conjugal rights on grounds which would justify a decree of divorce, and it was further said that it would be monstrous to pronounce a decree for restitution and enforce it by imprisonment in such a case as this, and that, therefore, there must exist sufficient ground for a divorce. I find myself unable to accept this as a guide to the determination of the question whether cruelty entitling to a divorce has been established. I think that the law of restitution of conjugal rights as administered in the courts did sometimes lead to results which I can only call barbarous. I need seek no better illustration of this than Holmes v. Holmes (25), decided in 1755, which is relied on for the proposition that the courts can only refuse restitution on grounds which would justify a divorce. Conduct of a most revolting character on the part of the husband was held to afford no answer to his claim for a restitution of conjugal rights. Indeed, if the broadest definition of cruelty which has been contended for in this case were accepted, it I would still be, to my mind, unsatisfactory that a husband who, though stopping short of cruelty in that sense, had by insult and outrage driven his wife to leave him, should, without repentance for the past or any assurance of amendment for the future, be able to invoke the assistance of the court and call for the strong arm of the law to force his wife, under pain of imprisonment, to resume cohabitation. One would think that the court might well refuse to afford its assistance to one who acted thus. And, notwithstanding the decision to which I have referred, there are not wanting dicta of eminent judges, and notably of LORD STOWELL, that "something short of legal cruelty" might bar a suit for restitution. However that may be, the matter is of less importance than it formerly was, as the legislature has interposed, and even if the court is still bound to make a decree for restitution, it is no longer bound to enforce it, as before.

Upon a review of the authorities prior to the time when the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, came into operation [Jan. 1, 1858], I think that it may confidently be asserted that in not a single case was a divorce on the ground of cruelty granted, unless there had been bodily hurt or injury to health, or a reasonable apprehension of one or other of these. And it may with equal confidence be asserted that no other test was ever applied when it had to be determined whether a sentence of divorce on the ground of cruelty should be pronounced. I can find no case in which the impossibility that the duties of married life could be discharged was treated as the criterion. If it be the true criterion, it is scarcely conceivable that circumstances should not have occurred for its application during the period, more than a century, covered by reported cases. Indeed, if in the present case a separation ought to be decreed because, under the circumstances, the discharge of the duties of married life must be regarded as impossible, would their discharge not be impossible in just the same sense where a husband persisted in charging his wife with adultery without cause, or falsely accused her of incest? And yet we have an emphatic declaration by eminent judges in both these cases that such conduct would not warrant a divorce on the ground of cruelty.

So far I have dealt only with the authorities prior to 1858. These are the really important ones. The court for matrimonial causes is governed and controlled by a distinct statutory injunction. It can only act and give relief on principles and rules as nearly as may be conformable to the "principles and rules" on which the ecclesiastical courts had "theretofore acted and given relief." But the principle or rule that a judicial separation can only be granted on the ground of cruelty where there has been injury to body or health, or the reasonable apprehension of it, has been frequently recognised and acted upon since 1858. The law has never been enunciated in other terms, and no other test has been suggested as the correct one. The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, came into operation on Jan. 1, 1858. On May 5 following, in Tomkins v. Tomkins (13), SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL, in the course of the argument, said (1 Sw. & Tr. at p. 169):

"I rather apprehend that in such a case as this I shall be bound to direct the jury what acts constitute legal cruelty, and they will have to find whether the acts done are cruelty or not. Here I imagine the issue is cruelty or no cruelty, and I shall have to inform the jury what cruelty is."

When the learned judge came to sum up he said (ibid. at p. 170):

"It will be my duty to endeavour to point out what the law on such questions is, as now, for the first time, juries have to deal with these matters. LORD STOWELL's judgment in Evans v. Evans (5) is the great authority on questions of legal cruelty."

After reading passages from that judgment ending with that with which I have concluded my quotation, the learned judge proceeded thus (ibid. at pp. 171, 172):

"Danger of life and limb or health has continued in substance the rule upon which the courts have acted; the phrase has sometimes been varied. SIR

A JOHN NICHOLL has used the expression 'injury to person or health,' which I am inclined to take in conjunction with LORD STOWELL's expression, for there might be a great deal of suffering and brutal usage without coming strictly within the terms of the latter. There must, however, be bodily hurt, not trifling or temporary pain, or a reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt. It will be for you to determine whether the husband has so treated his wife, and so manifested his feelings towards her, as to have inflicted bodily injury, to have caused reasonable apprehension of bodily suffering, or to have injured health."

This is a clear and, I apprehend, an accurate statement of the law administered by the ecclesiastical courts. It has been suggested that it was not a complete exposition of the law, but merely such a statement as was necessary, having regard to the facts proved in the particular case. I am unable so to regard it. It purports to inform the jury what legal cruelty is. The learned judge speaks of danger of life or limb or health, as "the rule on which the courts have acted." There is surely—I say it with all respect—a fallacy in speaking of the law laid down as sufficient for the purposes of the particular case. If acts which did not involve danger to person or health would have entitled the jury to find that cruelty had been established, if the real question was whether the circumstances were such as to render the discharge of marriage duties impossible, the judge was, I think, bound so to direct the jury. Moreover, so far as I can discover, SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL never gave any jury a different direction from that to be found in Tomkins v. Tomkins (13), or expounded the law otherwise. Nor has your Lordships' attention been called to any different exposition of the law on the part of his successors. How deeply rooted the notion was that personal safety was the only ground for the court's interference is shown by Pickard v. Pickard (15), and Forth v. Forth (17), where LORD PENZANCE granted a judicial separation on the petition of the husband on the ground that the husband was likely to be incited to acts of violence by his wife's conduct, and that if he refused to relieve from the perils of provocation, there would be no security for the safety of the wife.

F I may refer, as one of the latest cases on the subject where the law is to be found laid down, to the judgment of LORD PENZANCE in Milford v. Milford (26). In spite of profligate conduct on the part of the husband, the knowledge of which he seems to have ostentatiously obtruded upon his wife, the learned judge refused a decree, saying (L.R. 1 P. & D. at p. 299):

G "The essential features of cruelty are familiar. There must be actual violence of such a character as to endanger personal health or safety, or there must be the reasonable apprehension of it, the court, as LORD STOWELL once said, has never been driven off this ground; nor do the cases cited, whatever general expressions may have fallen from the court, affect to decide that anything short of this will be sufficient to found a decree upon cruelty. The ground of the court's interference is the wife's safety, and the impossibility of her fulfilling the duties of matrimony in a state of dread."

I With one possible exception, not a single case has been cited since 1858, any more than before that date, in which a decree has been granted on any other ground. The case to which I refer is Milner v. Milner (14), which came before SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL in 1861. The husband had taken his wife by the shoulders, pushed her against a wall, and thrust his umbrella against her person, in consequence of which passers-by took her for a prostitute. The learned judge granted a divorce. The husband had previously committed acts of violence towards his wife, though not for some years. It is to be observed that the respondent did not appear, and, therefore, no argument was addressed to the court against the prayer of this petition, and that the counsel for the petitioner argued that the insult to the petitioner was of so gross a character as to render further cohabitation outrageous to the feelings of the wife, and, therefore, likely to be injurious to her health. Whether the learned judge adopted this view, or thought that, having regard to the previous conduct of the husband, the wife's safety was endangered, it is impossible to say. He did not enter upon any discussion of the law, and beyond saying that the respondent had been guilty of as great an indignity as if he had spat in his wife's face gave no reasons for his judgment. Such a decision obviously cannot be regarded as having any important bearing upon the question what were the principles and rules upon which the ecclesiastical courts acted. It is much more significant that it is the only case which the research of counsel has been able to produce in which it can be even plausibly contended that relief has been given on a ground other than danger to person or health. A

I am certainly not indisposed to arrive at the conclusion that the husband in the present case has established a case for a judicial separation. But, in laying down a proposition of law on such a subject as that with which your Lordships are dealing, it is necessary to keep in view the consequences, and not to contemplate only its operation in the particular case. The only criterion of cruelty which I have heard suggested as warranting a judgment for the husband is whether the discharge of the duties of married life has become impossible owing to the conduct of the wife. How is the word "impossible" to be interpreted in the proposition thus stated? Obviously not as confined to physical impossibility, or it would not cover the present case. If it be extended to what is sometimes called "moral" impossibility, a proposition could scarcely be conceived more elastic. It would afford no sort of guide, but would, in my opinion, unsettle the law, and throw it into hopeless confusion. Views as to what is possible or impossible in this sense would differ most widely. Though in some instances most men would, no doubt, concur in their opinion, yet, speaking generally, the determination of the case would depend entirely upon the particular judge or jury before whom it might chance to come. C

Not a few would think that the discharge of the duties of married life was impossible whenever love had been replaced by hatred, when insulting and galling language was constantly used, when in short the ordinary marital relations no longer prevailed. The opinion may be held by many that it would be well that in all such cases a judicial separation should be granted, that relief should be always given where the prospect of happiness, so long as the parties cohabited, appeared hopeless. But these are considerations for the legislature, and not for the courts. If divorce à mensa et thoro is to be extended beyond the limits within which it has hitherto been confined, the change must, in my opinion, be made by legislation. Our duty on the present occasion is to administer, and not to make the law. I have no inclination towards a blind adherence to precedents. I am conscious that the law must be moulded by adapting it on established principles to the changing conditions which social development evolves. But marital misconduct is unfortunately as old as matrimony itself. Great as have been the social changes which have characterised the last century, in this respect there has been no alteration, no new development. I think it is impossible to do otherwise than proceed upon the old lines. I cannot bring myself to say that, if we were to yield to the husband's contention in this case, we should be acting and giving relief on principles and rules conformable to the principles and rules on which the ecclesiastical courts formerly acted. And this we are by statute enjoined to do. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed. F
H

LORD MACNAGHTEN concurred in the judgment of LORD HERSCHELL. I

LORD MORRIS concurred in the judgment of LORD ASHBOURNE.

LORD SHAND.—Two alternative views have been presented by the parties as to the principle or rule which should be applied in the decision of this case, in answering the question whether the wife has been guilty of such cruelty as the law holds to be sufficient to entitle the husband to a decree of separation. The great importance

A of the case as affecting the rights of husband and wife in their marital relations lies in the determination of the question which of these alternatives is to be adopted, not merely as between the parties to this suit, but as fixing the criterion by which future cases must be decided. It is maintained by the husband that the question to be put and decided in such cases on the issue of cruelty is whether the conduct of the husband or wife complained of has been such as to make continued cohabitation impossible. B The alternative maintained by the wife is that the conduct complained of must be such as to have caused danger, or a reasonable apprehension of danger, to life, limb, or health.

Outside of these two views, or within them, as presenting two extremes, no third criterion or rule has been suggested either in the argument or in the judgments of the Court of Appeal or in the opinions of your Lordships. C The view which has been taken by LORD ASHBOURNE and LORD MORRIS, that a case like the present, in which the cruelty may be described in popular language as "gross cruelty" or cruelty of a "most grievous character," and so may be treated in an exceptional manner apart from any rule or criterion, appears to me to give no third test, unless it be that of the "circumstances of the case," which with great deference, would not supply any guide for the decision of future cases; for I do not see what can be the line which D would distinguish between cases of cruelty and cases of gross cruelty. In deciding which criterion of the two suggested by the parties is to be taken as expressing the law as it now exists, the courts of law are by the Act of 1857 required to proceed on principles and rules as nearly as may be those on which the ecclesiastical courts acted previous to the passing of that statute. The difficulty in the decision of the question is sufficiently shown by the close division of opinion, not only of the judges E who have hitherto dealt with it, but also by your Lordships' House.

After the most anxious consideration, and while I should have been far from unwilling, if I could do so with safety to the law to be applied in other cases, to hold that Lady Russell's scandalous and atrocious conduct entitled her husband to the decree he asks, I have come to the conclusion that Lord Russell has failed to F establish such cruelty as the law recognises as sufficient. It appears to me that the result of the authorities, so fully considered in the opinion which has been delivered by LORD HERSCHELL, is that the rule or principle for which the respondent contends, and to which effect has been given in the judgment of the Court of Appeal, is that on which the ecclesiastical courts acted previous to the statute, and is now the law, and that, however truly it may be said that the wife here has been guilty of cruelty G in a popular or wide sense of the term, it has not been shown that there has been cruelty in the sense which the law requires as a ground of divorce or separation.

It would be idle repetition again to go through the stream of authorities on the subject, and to analyse or criticise the various forms of expression used with reference to the meaning to be given to the term "cruelty" as applicable to the particular and varying circumstances of so many cases. In many cases, and particularly H those in which questions arose as to the admission of articles for proof, it appears to me that the word is used in the opinions or judgments in a popular sense, but that where the criterion came to be stated in the determination of the merits of the cases, having regard to the facts in evidence, that criterion was danger or apprehension of danger to life or health, which it must be observed, with reference to much of the argument for the husband in the present case, is a much more comprehensive term than physical violence, and a term which has, I think, been found I sufficient to cover all the cases in which hitherto relief has been granted. It is true that in many cases learned judges have used expressions that the conduct of the husband or wife complained of has made domestic life intolerable or impossible. On examination of the cases, however, it will, I think, be found that these words are used, if not in all, yet in most instances where it has been shown that danger or apprehension of danger to health has been proved as a ground for action. In such cases every one will be agreed that it is quite correct and true to say that continued cohabitation has become impossible. If I am right in so thinking, this is very far indeed from making "the continued cohabitation of husband and wife impossible" (with all the vagueness which must attend the application of so loose a criterion to the facts of each particular case) a safe or satisfactory standard in the determination of the question of cruelty. A

It is, indeed, only because I desired to add a few words to what has been already said on this subject that I have ventured to trouble your Lordships with any observations. Questions of divorce or separation are now frequently tried before juries. Suppose the presiding judge, in the direction which he gives, to tell the jury that the test which they are to apply in reaching their verdict must be: Has the conduct of the wife or husband been such as to make continued cohabitation unbearable or impossible? I should certainly not be surprised if the jury should ask for some direction much more precise and definite, and without such a direction I should say that the law would be involved in much confusion and uncertainty. B
Is each of the jury, according to his own views of the principles which should guide the conduct of married persons, and of the particular conduct proved, to determine for himself whether cohabitation has or has not become impossible? Such a guide is given if the judge is able to say that future cohabitation must be with safety to the husband or wife complaining, and that a reasonable apprehension of danger to life or health cannot consist with the idea of safety. D

But if this criterion is not to be supplied, what is to take its place? A judge must, I think, be prepared either in directing a jury, or in making up his own mind where the decision rests with him, to formulate in some way the elements which, in his view, are sufficient to bring the case up to one in which it can be predicated that further joint domestic life has become impossible; and the fatal defect in the argument on behalf of the husband in the present case appears to me to be that it entirely fails to provide any test or criterion to be applied in the solution of that question. E
If the husband's argument be well founded, it would not be necessary to aver or to show that any apprehension of danger to health existed. What is there to take the place of this? Is it to be enough that great mental distress and pain will be suffered, or that the spouse complained of has acted so as to destroy all affection, and to create even a horror of future intercourse? The present is a F flagrant, probably an unprecedented, case, where so foul and loathsome a charge has been made and persisted in without belief in its truth on the part of the wife; but many cases might be figured and must occur in which circumstances far short of this would, in the opinion of many jurymen, make future cohabitation intolerable. A husband or wife might never cease to introduce and press subjects of conversation, knowing this would necessarily cause extreme irritation and mental distress—G —might never cease to use reproaches for past moral misconduct with the same result—might constantly use language opprobrious and insulting, or continuously make unfounded charges of moral misconduct or even criminal offences of a serious character, though much less grave than the wife in this case made. In such cases, if it should be shown that injury to health results, or reasonable apprehension of such injury exists, the law will give a remedy, for that is a criterion to which an H appeal can be made and one which admits of application. Without such a criterion there must be the utmost uncertainty, for it must be left to the judge or jury to form their own notion of what conduct will or will not make continued domestic life impossible, with the single qualification, itself admitting of great diversity of views, that the conduct complained of must be of a grave, weighty, and serious I character.

These considerations seem to me fully to account for and to justify the observation of LORD STOWELL in Evans v. Evans (5), so often quoted, when he said with reference to the criterion of injury or apprehended injury to health: "The court has never been driven off this ground." It has been argued that the issue of impossibility of continued domestic life without any guide or criterion of the proof necessary to establish this, is not unlike issues which raise questions of honesty, or malice, or the like, which are constantly tried. The case of malice is not a very

A happy illustration by way of parallel, for there is perhaps no term in the law which has given rise to more diversity of opinion or more litigation from the loose way in which it has been used, sometimes in its ordinary and popular meaning of hatred or ill-will and a desire to injure as a motive, which is easily understood without any direction, and at other times in a much wider sense. But when the term is used to describe anything short of malicious motive, it is certainly necessary for the judge to define the particular meaning to be ascribed to it in its legal sense in the particular case. In an issue of fraud, again, there is no difficulty, such as occurs in reference to impossibility of cohabitation. Everyone at once understands the meaning of a false and fraudulent representation. No other words of definition would be better than these words themselves—and an intention to deceive successfully carried out is a term clear in itself which admits of no better elucidation than the words supply—whatever may be the difficulty in particular cases of saying whether the fraudulent motive and deceit have been in fact proved.

Holding, then, as I do, that the majority of the Court of Appeal were right in applying the test or criterion which they did to the facts of the case, I agree in thinking the husband's case fails. It is true that the conduct of the wife cannot be condemned in terms too strong. The persistence in gross charges of foul immorality, the truth of which she did not believe, charges which were calculated so deeply to wound her husband's feelings and to degrade him in the eyes of the world, was cruelty—I should even say gross cruelty, in a wide and popular sense of the words. It has not, however, been shown that her conduct was such as the law holds to be sufficient to entitle the husband to a decree of divorce or separation, for it cannot be said that injury to, or apprehended injury to, his health has resulted. It has been decided that, in consequence of the wife's conduct, she has now forfeited all right to restitution of legal rights, and cannot, therefore, require that cohabitation should be resumed, and this decree has become final. If the wife could have insisted on cohabitation it might have been said that the probability of such charges being repeated in the husband's presence by the wife might lead to his doing violence to her in his anger; but, the risk of this having been removed, there is no reason for granting a decree of separation on this ground, which was suggested in the course of the husband's argument. I am, on the whole, of opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed, and that, if it should be thought desirable that a different rule or principle of law from that which has, I think, hitherto prevailed should in future receive effect, the change must be brought about by legislation, which in any view should give some other criterion of cruelty than that which now exists, or should make something short of cruelty, in the sense which the law has attached to that term in questions between husband and wife, a ground for granting a decree of divorce, or at least of separation.

LORD DAVEY.—The only act of cruelty upon which the appellant relies as entitling him to a judicial separation is the publication of a libel upon him imputing to him an infamous crime without any belief in the truth of the imputation. It must be admitted that this is a gross outrage by one person upon another, and an abominable action of a wife towards a husband. But the question is whether it constitutes what has been called legal cruelty such as will by itself entitle the appellant to demand a judicial separation.

In answering this question it is important to bear in mind the legal proposition or definition of legal cruelty for which counsel for the appellant contend, and the conditions under which the court has to approach the consideration of the question, and test the soundness of the appellant's proposition. To take the latter point first. The court is not entitled to adopt its own view of what degree or kind of cruelty, or what description of behaviour or conduct by one spouse towards another, should be a ground of judicial separation. But by s. 22 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, it is thrown back upon the principles acted on by the ecclesiastical courts in the exercise of their jurisdiction before the Act; and in order to constitute a ground for judicial separation the behaviour or conduct complained of must be of such a description as before the Act would have entitled the complaining spouse to a divorce a mensa et thoro in the ecclesiastical courts. The reported decisions of these courts have been cited to us or commented on with great ability by counsel on both sides of the Bar. The general idea which I think underlies all those decisions is that, while declining to lay down any hard-and-fast definition of legal cruelty, the courts acted on the principle of giving protection to the complaining spouse against actual or apprehended violence, physical ill-treatment, or injury to health. A

What, then, is the proposition for which the appellant contends? The proposition was that cruelty is such wilful infliction of bodily or mental pain as is calculated to render matrimonial relations unendurable. And the learned counsel added that there are no legal limitations as to the character of the cruelty, though it must be gross in degree. It must be remembered that these cases are now tried by a jury; and, therefore, the proposition is that whatever conduct, in the opinion of a jury properly directed, causes bodily or mental pain such as is calculated to render matrimonial relations unendurable, is legal cruelty. I will not weary your Lordships by going through or analysing the cases cited. I only desire to say that many of the cases cited were upon admission of articles in which allegations were held admissible as aggravation or as evidence of intention, though not alone or in themselves affording substantive ground for relief. C

I agree generally with the opinion expressed by LORD HERSCHELL on the effect and result of the authorities cited. In my opinion, the proposition goes far beyond anything which had been laid down by the learned judges of the ecclesiastical court before the Act of 1857, and appears to me to be very far-reaching in its possible application. I express no opinion whether the court ought or ought not, as a matter of policy, to give relief on that principle. My only duty is to say whether the appellant's contention is conformable to the principles on which the ecclesiastical courts formerly acted and gave relief. I am constrained to say that, in my opinion, it is not, and I see no reason to differ from the reasons given by the majority of the judges in the Court of Appeal. There is no question here of personal violence, and in the circumstances of the case I see no evidence of any apprehended injury to the appellant's physical or mental health against which he requires protection. To use the words of LORD STOWELL, E

"The respondent's conduct is a high moral offence in the marriage state undoubtedly, not innocent, surely, in any state of life, but still it is not that cruelty against which the law can relieve."

Company—Legal position—Legal entity separate and distinct from its members—“One-man” company—Legality—Irrelevance of motive for promotion—Company not agent of, or trustee for shareholders.

A company which has complied with the requirements relating to the incorporation of companies contained in the Companies Acts is a legal entity separate and distinct from the individual members of the company. It matters not that all the shares in the company are held by one person, excepting one share each held by the persons who, as required by the Acts, have subscribed their names to the memorandum of association to enable the company legally to be formed, nor does it matter that those persons are merely the nominees of the principal shareholder. Once a company has been legally incorporated it must be treated like any other independent person with rights and liabilities appropriate to itself, and the motives of those who promote the company (e.g., to enable them to trade with the benefit of limited liability) are absolutely irrelevant in discussing what those rights and liabilities are. A company is not the agent of the shareholders to carry on their business for them, nor is it the trustee for them of their property.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, [1895] 2 Ch. 323, reversed.

Notes. The Companies Act, 1862, was repealed by the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. The statute now in force is the Companies Act, 1948 (3 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 452). Where provisions of the 1862 Act are mentioned in their Lordships' opinions (infra) the corresponding sections of the Act of 1948 are indicated. Two or more persons can now form a private company.

Cross-Appeals from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LINDLEY, LOPES, and KAY, L.J.J.), reported [1895] 2 Ch. 323, affirming an order of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.

The appellant, Aron Salomon, had for some thirty years prior to 1892 carried on business as a leather merchant and hide factor and wholesale and export boot manufacturer under the style of A. Salomon & Co. A limited company was formed in 1892 to carry on the business, the subscribers to the memorandum of association being the appellant, his wife and daughter, and his four sons. The nominal capital of the company was £40,000, divided into £1 shares; 20,007 shares were issued, of which the appellant held 20,001, the other signatories of the memorandum of association holding one share each. The appellant's business was sold to the company for £38,782, of which £16,000 was to be paid in cash or debentures, and at the first meeting of the directors, who consisted of the appellant and two of his sons, it was resolved to pay the appellant £6,000 in cash and £10,000 in debentures. These debentures were afterwards mortgaged by the appellant to one Edmund Broderip as a security for an advance of £5,000, but eventually they were cancelled, and £10,000 fresh debentures were issued to Edmund Broderip. In October, 1893, an order was made for the winding-up of the company, at which date the company was indebted to unsecured creditors other than Aron Salomon to the amount of £7,773. An action was brought by the liquidator of the company against the appellant, which was tried before VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., who declared that the

A company were entitled to be indemnified by the appellant to the amount of £7,733. This decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal as above mentioned. The company brought a cross-appeal against an order of the Court of Appeal on a counterclaim filed by the company asking for rescission of the contract.

B Cohen, Q.C., Buckley, Q.C., McCall, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie for the appellant.
Farwell, Q.C., and Theobald for the respondent company.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Nov. 16, 1896. LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—The important question in this case, and I am not certain that it is not the only question, is whether the respondent company was a company at all—whether, in truth, that artificial creation of the legislature had been validly constituted in this instance; and, in order to determine that question, it is necessary to look at what the statute itself has determined in that respect. I have no right to add to the requirements of the statute, nor to take from the requirements thus enacted. The sole guide must be the statute itself.

D That there were seven actual living persons who held shares in the company has not been doubted [see Companies Act, 1948, s. 1, which provides for the formation of a company by seven persons]. As to the proportionate amounts held by each I will deal with them presently; but it is important to observe that this first condition of the statute is satisfied, and it follows as a consequence that it would not be competent to anyone, and certainly not to these persons themselves, to deny that they were shareholders. I must pause here to point out that the statute enacts nothing as to the extent or degree of interest which may be held by each of the seven, or as to the proportion of interest or influence possessed by one or the majority of the shareholders over the others. One share is enough. Still less is it possible to contend that the motive of becoming shareholders, or of making them shareholders, is a field of inquiry which the statute itself recognises as legitimate. If they are shareholders they are shareholders for all purposes, and, even if the statute was silent as to the recognition of trusts, I should be prepared to hold that if six of them were the cestuis que trust of the seventh, whatever might be their rights inter se, the statute would have made them shareholders to all intents and purposes with their respective rights and liabilities.

G Dealing with them in their relation to the company, the only relation which I believe the law would sanction would be that they were incorporators of the corporate body. I am simply here dealing with the provisions of the statute, and it seems to me to be essential to the artificial creation that the law should recognise only that artificial existence, quite apart from the motives or conduct of individual incorporators. In saying this I do not at all mean to suggest that if it could be established that this provision of the statute to which I am adverting had not been complied with, you could not go behind the certificate of incorporation to show that a fraud had been committed upon the officer intrusted with the duty of giving the certificate, and that by some proceeding in the nature scire facias you could not prove the fact that the company had no legal existence. But, short of such proof, it seems to me impossible to dispute that once the company is legally incorporated it must be treated like any other independent person with rights and liabilities appropriate to itself, and that the motives of those who took part in the promotion of the company are absolutely irrelevant in discussing what those rights and liabilities are.

I I will, for the sake of argument, assume the proposition that the Court of Appeal lays down, that the formation of the company was a mere scheme to enable Aron Salomon to carry on business in the name of the company. I am wholly unable to follow the proposition that this was contrary to the true intent and meaning of the Companies Act. I can only find the true intent and meaning of the Act from the Act itself, and the Act appears to me to give a company a legal existence with, as I have said, rights and liabilities of its own, whatever may have been the ideas or schemes of those who brought it into existence. I observe that VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., held that the business was Mr. Salomon's business and no one else's, and that he chose to employ as agent a limited company, and he proceeded to argue that he was employing that limited company as agent, and that he was bound to indemnify that agent—the company. I confess it seems to me that that very learned judge becomes involved by this argument in a very singular contradiction. Either the limited company was a legal entity or it was not. If it was, the business belonged to it and not to Mr. Salomon; if it was not, there was no person and no thing to be an agent at all; and it is impossible to say at the same time that there is a company and there is not. LINDLEY, L.J., on the other hand, affirms that there were seven members of the company, but, he says, it is manifest that six of them were members simply in order to enable the seventh himself to carry on business with limited liability, so that the object of the whole arrangement was to do the very thing which the legislature intended not to be done.

It is obvious to inquire where is that intention of the legislature manifested in the statute? Even if we were at liberty to insert words to manifest that intention, I should have great difficulty in ascertaining what the exact intention thus imputed to the legislature is or was. In this particular case it is the members of one family that represent all the shares; but if the supposed intention is not limited to so narrow a proposition as this, that the seven members must not be members of one family, to what extent may influence or authority or intentional purchase of a majority among the shareholders be carried so as to bring it within the supposed prohibition? It is, of course, easy to say that it was contrary to the intention of the legislature—a proposition which, by reason of its generality, it is difficult to bring to the test; but when one seeks to put as an affirmative proposition what the thing is which the legislature has prohibited, there is, as it appears to me, an insuperable difficulty in the way of those who seek to insert by construction such a prohibition into the statute.

As one mode of testing the proposition it would be pertinent to ask whether two or three, or, indeed, all seven, may constitute the whole of the shareholders. Whether they must be all independent of each other in the sense of each having an independent beneficial interest—and this is a question that cannot be answered by the reply that it is a matter of degree. If the legislature intended to prohibit something, you ought to know what that something is. All it has said is that one share is sufficient to constitute a shareholder, though the shares may be 100,000 in number. Where am I to get from the statute itself a limitation of that provision that that shareholder must be an independent and beneficially interested person? I find all through the judgment of the Court of Appeal a repetition of the same proposition to which I have already adverted—that the business was the business of Aron Salomon, and that the company is variously described as a myth and a fiction. LOPES, L.J., says:

“The Act contemplated the incorporation of seven independent bona fide members, who had a mind and a will of their own, and were not the mere puppets of an individual who, adopting the machinery of the Act, carried on his old business in the same way as before, when he was a sole trader.”

The words “seven independent bona fide members with a mind and will of their own and not the puppets of an individual” are by construction to be read into the Act. LOPES, L.J., also said that the company was a mere nominis umbra. KAY, L.J., says:

“The statutes were intended to allow seven or more persons bona fide associated for the purpose of trade to limit their liability under certain conditions and to become a corporation. But they were not intended to legalise a pretended association for the purpose of enabling an individual to carry on his own business with limited liability in the name of a joint-stock company.”

A The learned judges appear to me not to have been absolutely certain in their own minds whether to treat the company as a real thing or not. If it was a real thing, if it had a legal existence, and if, consequently, the law attributed to it certain rights and liabilities in its constitution as a company, it appears to me to follow as a consequence that it is impossible to deny the validity of the transactions into which it has entered. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., appears to me to have disposed of the argument that the company, which for this purpose he assumed to be a legal entity, was defrauded into the purchase of Aron Salomon's business, because, assuming that the price paid for the business was an exorbitant one as to which I am myself not satisfied, but assuming that it was, the learned judge most cogently observes that when all the shareholders are perfectly cognisant of the conditions under which the company is formed and the conditions of the purchase, it is impossible to contend that the company is being defrauded. The proposition laid down in Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co. (1)—I quote the headnote—is, that

D “Persons who purchase property and then create a company to purchase from them the property they possess, stand in a fiduciary position towards that company, and must faithfully state to the company the facts which apply to the property, and would influence the company in deciding on the reasonableness of acquiring it.”

E But if every member of the company, every shareholder, knows exactly what is the true state of the facts, which for this purpose must be assumed to be the case here, VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.'s, conclusion seems to me to be inevitable—that no case of fraud upon the company could here be established.

F If there was no fraud and no agency, and if the company was a real one and not a fiction or a myth, every one of the grounds upon which it is sought to support the judgment is disposed of. The truth is that the learned judges have never allowed in their own minds the proposition that the company has a real existence. They have been struck by what they have considered the inexpediency of permitting one man to be, in influence and authority, the whole company, and assuming that such a thing could not have been intended by the legislature, they have sought various grounds upon which they might insert into the Act some prohibition of such a result. Whether such a result be right or wrong, politic or impolitic, I say, with the utmost deference to the learned judges, that we have nothing to do with that question if this company has been duly constituted by law, and, whatever may be the motives of those who constitute it, I must decline to insert into that Act of Parliament limitations which are not to be found there.

I have dealt with this matter upon the narrow hypothesis propounded by the learned judges below, but it is, I think, only justice to the appellant to say that I see nothing whatever to justify the imputations which are implied in some of the observations made by more than one of the learned judges. The appellant, in my opinion, is not shown to have done, or to have intended to do, anything dishonest or unworthy, but to have suffered a great misfortune without any fault of his own. The result is that I move your Lordships that the judgment appealed from be reversed, but as this is a pauper case I regret to say it can only be with such costs in this House as are appropriate to that condition of things, and that this appeal be dismissed with costs to the same extent.

I LORD WATSON.—This appeal raises some questions of practical importance, depending upon the construction of the Companies Acts, which do not appear to have been settled by previous decisions. As I am not prepared to accept without reservation all the conclusions of fact which found favour with the courts below, I shall, before adverting to the law, state what I conceive to be the material facts established by the evidence before us.

The appellant, Aron Salomon, for many years carried on business, on his own account, as a leather merchant and wholesale boot manufacturer. With the design of transferring his business to a joint-stock company, which was to consist exclusively of himself and members of his own family, he, on July 20, 1892, entered into a preliminary agreement with one Adolph Anholt, as trustee for the future company, settling the terms upon which the transfer was to be made by him, one of its conditions being that, in part payment, he was to receive £10,000 in debentures of the company. A memorandum of association was then executed by the appellant, his wife, a daughter, and four sons, each of them subscribing for one share, in which the leading object for which the company was formed was stated to be the adoption and carrying into effect, with such modifications (if any) as might be agreed on, of the provisional agreement of July 20. The memorandum was registered on July 28, 1892, and the effect of registration, if otherwise valid, was to incorporate the company, under the name of "Aron Salomon & Co., Ltd.," with liability limited by shares, and having a nominal capital of £40,000 divided into 40,000 shares of £1 each.

The company adopted the agreement of July 20, subject to certain modifications which are not material; and an agreement to that effect was executed between them and the appellant on Aug. 2, 1892. Within a month or two after that date the whole stipulations of the agreement were fulfilled by both parties. In terms thereof, 100 debentures, for £100 each, were issued to the appellant, who, upon the security of these documents, obtained an advance of £5,000 from Edmund Broderip. In February, 1893, the original debentures were returned to the company and cancelled, and in lieu thereof, with the consent of the appellant as beneficial owner, fresh debentures to the same amount were issued to Mr. Broderip, in order to secure the repayment of his loan, with interest at 8 per cent. In September, 1892, the appellant applied for and obtained an allotment of 20,000 shares; and from that date until an order was made for its compulsory liquidation, the share register of the company remained unaltered, 20,001 shares being held by the appellant and six shares by his wife and family. It was all along the intention of these persons to retain the business in their own hands, and not to permit any outsider to acquire an interest in it.

Default having been made in the payment of interest upon his debentures, Mr. Broderip, in September, 1893, instituted an action in order to enforce his security against the assets of the company. Thereafter a liquidation order was made and a liquidator appointed, at the instance of unsecured creditors of the company. It has now been ascertained that, if the amount realised from the assets of the company were, in the first place, applied in extinction of Mr. Broderip's debt and interest, there would remain a balance of about £1,055, which is claimed by the applicant as beneficial owner of the debentures. In the event of his claim being sustained there will be no funds left for payment of the unsecured creditors, whose debts amount to £7,333 8s. 6d. The liquidator lodged a defence in the name of the company, to the debenture suit, in which he counterclaimed against the appellant (i) to have the agreements of July 20 and Aug. 2, 1892, rescinded, (ii) to have the debentures already mentioned delivered up and cancelled, (iii) repayment of all sums paid by the company to the appellant under these agreements, and (iv) a lien for these sums upon the business and assets. The averments made in support of these claims were to the effect that the price paid by the company exceeded the real value of the business and assets by upwards of £8,200; that the arrangements made by the appellant for the formation of the company were a fraud upon the creditors of the company; that no board of directors of the company was ever appointed, and that in any case such board consisted entirely of the appellant, and there never was an independent board.

The case went to proof before VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., when the liquidator was examined as a witness on behalf of the company, while evidence was given for the appellant by himself and by his son, Emanuel Salomon, one of the members of the company, who had been employed in the business for nearly twenty years. The evidence shows that before its transfer to the new company the business had been

A prosperous, and had yielded to the appellant annual profits sufficient to maintain himself and family and to add to his capital. It also shows that, at the date of the transfer, the business was perfectly solvent. The liquidator, whose testimony was chiefly directed toward proving that the price paid by the company was excessive, admitted in cross-examination that the business when transferred to the company was in a sound condition, and that there was a substantial surplus. No evidence was led tending to support the allegation that no board of directors was ever appointed, or that the board consisted entirely of the appellant. The non-success and ultimate insolvency of the business, after it came into the hands of the company, was attributed by the witness Emanuel Salomon to a succession of strikes in the boot trade, and there is not a tittle of evidence tending to modify or contradict his statement. I think it also appears from the evidence that all the members of the company were fully cognisant of the terms of the agreements of July 20 and Aug. 2, 1892, and that they were willing to accept and did accept those terms. The case was heard before the learned judge who, at the close of the argument, announced that he was not prepared to grant the relief craved by the company. He at the same time suggested that a different remedy might be open to the company, and, on the motion of their counsel, he allowed the counterclaim to be amended.

In conformity with the suggestion thus made by the Bench, a new and alternative claim was added for (i) a declaration that the appellant is liable to indemnify the company against the whole of their unsecured debts, (ii) judgment against him for £7,733 8s. 3d., being the amount of these debts, and (iii) a lien for that amount upon all sums which might be payable to the appellant by the company, in respect of his debentures or otherwise, until the judgment was satisfied. There were also added averments to the effect that the company was formed by the appellant and that the debentures for £10,000 were issued in order that he might carry on the business and take all the profits without risk to himself, and also that the company was the "mere nominee and agent" of the appellant. The allegations of the company, in so far as they have any relation to the amended claim, their pith consisting in the averments made on amendment, were meant to convey a charge of fraud, and it is unfortunate that they are framed in such loose and general terms. A relevant charge of fraud ought to disclose the specific facts necessitating the inference that a fraud was perpetrated upon some person specified. Whether it was a fraud upon the company and its members, or upon persons who had dealings with the company, is not indicated, although there may be very different considerations applicable to those two cases.

The res gestæ which might imply that it was the appellant, and not the company, who actually carried on its business are not set forth. Any person who holds a preponderating share in the stock of a limited company has necessarily the intention of taking the lion's share of its profits, without any risk beyond loss of the money which he has paid for or is liable to pay upon his shares, and the fact of his acquiring and holding debentures secured upon the assets of the company does not diminish that risk. What is meant by the assertion that the company "was the mere nominee or agent" of the appellant, I cannot gather from the record, and I am not sure I understand precisely in what sense it was interpreted by the learned judges whose decisions we have to consider. No additional proof was given after the amendment of the counterclaim. The oral testimony has very little, if any, bearing upon the second claim; and any material facts relating to the fraudulent objects which the appellant is said to have had in view, and the alleged position of the company as his nominee or agent, must be mere matter of inference derived from the agreements of July 20 and Aug. 2, 1892, the memorandum and articles of association, and the minute-book of the company.

On re-hearing the case VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., without disposing of the original claim, gave the company decree of indemnity in terms of their amended claim. I do not profess my ability to follow accurately the whole chain of reasoning by which the learned judge arrived at that conclusion, but he appears to have proceeded A mainly upon the ground that the appellant was in truth the company, the other members being either his trustees or mere "dummies," and, consequently, that the appellant carried on what was truly his own business under cover of the name of the company, which was nothing more than an alias for Aron Salomon. On appeal from his decision the Court of Appeal made an order finding it unnecessary to deal B with the original claim, and dismissing the appeal in so far as it related to the amended claim. The ratio upon which that affirmance proceeded, as embodied in the order, was: "This court, being of opinion that the formation of the company, the agreement of August, 1892, and the issue of debentures to Aron Salomon pursuant to such agreement, were a mere scheme to enable him to carry on business in the name of the company, with limited liability, contrary to the intent and meaning of the Companies Act, 1862, and, further, to enable him to obtain a pre- C ference over other creditors of the company by procuring a first charge on the assets of the company by means of such debentures. . . ."

The opinions delivered by the lords justices are strictly in keeping with the reasons assigned in their order. LINDLEY, L.J., after observing "that the incorporation of the company cannot be disputed," refers to the scheme of the formation D of the company, and says, "the object of the whole arrangement is to do the very thing which the legislature intended not to be done"; and he adds that "Mr.
Salomon's scheme is a device to defraud creditors." Assuming that the company was well incorporated in terms of the Act of 1862, an assumption upon which the decisions appealed from appear to me to throw considerable doubt, I think it expedient before considering the amended claim, to deal with the original claim for E rescission, which was strongly pressed upon us by counsel for the company, under their cross-appeal. Upon that branch of the case there does not appear to me to be much room for doubt. With the exception that the word "exorbitant" appears to me to be too strong an epithet I entirely agree with VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., when he says:

" I do not think that when you have a private company, and all the share- F holders in the company are perfectly cognisant of the conditions under which the company is formed, and the conditions of the purchase by the company, you can possibly say that purchasing at an exorbitant price (and I have no doubt whatever that the purchase here was at an exorbitant price) is a fraud upon those shareholders or upon the company."

The learned judge goes on to say that the circumstances might have amounted to G fraud if there had been an intention on the part of the original shareholders "to allot further shares at a later period to future allottees." Upon that point I do not find it necessary to express any opinion, because it is not raised by the facts of the case, and, in my view, these considerations are of no relevancy in a question as to rescission between the company and the appellant.

Counsel for the company argued that the agreement of Aug. 2 ought to be set H aside, upon the principle followed by this House in Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co. (1). In that case the vendor, who got up the company, with the view of selling his adventure to it, attracted shareholders by a prospectus which was essentially false. The directors, who were virtually his nominees, purchased from him without being aware of the real facts; and on their assurance that, in I so far as they knew, all was right the shareholders sanctioned the transaction. The fraud by which the company and its shareholders had been misled was directly traceable to the vendor; and the transaction was set aside at the instance of the liquidator, the Lord Chancellor (EARL CAIRNS) expressing a doubt whether, even in those circumstances, the remedy was not too late, after a liquidation order. But in the present case the agreement of July 20 was, in the full knowledge of the facts, approved and adopted by the company itself, if there was a company, and by all the shareholders who ever were or were likely to be members of the company.

A In my opinion, therefore, Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co. (1) has no application, and the original claim of the liquidator is not maintainable.

B The lords justices, in disposing of the amended claim, have expressly found that the formation of the company, with limited liability, and the issue of £10,000 worth of its debentures to the appellant, were "contrary to the true intent and meaning of the Companies Act, 1862." I have had great difficulty in endeavouring to interpret that finding. I am unable to comprehend how a company, which has been formed contrary to the true intent and meaning of a statute, and (in the language of LINDLEY, L.J.) does the very thing which the legislature intended not to be done, can yet be held to have been legally incorporated in terms of the statute. "Intention of the legislature" is a common, but very slippery phrase, which, C popularly understood, may signify anything from intention embodied in positive enactment to speculative opinion as to what the legislature probably would have meant, although there has been an omission to enact it. In a court of law or equity, what the legislature intended to be done or not to be done can only be legitimately ascertained from that which it has chosen to enact, either in express words or by reasonable and necessary implication. Accordingly, if the words "intent and meaning," as they occur in the finding of the Court of Appeal, are used in their D proper legal sense, it follows, in my opinion, that the company has not been well incorporated; that, there being no legal corporation, there can be no liquidation under the Companies Acts, and that the counterclaim preferred by its liquidator must fail. In that case its creditors would not be left without a remedy, because its members, as joint traders without limitation of their liability, would be jointly and severally responsible for the debts incurred by them in the name of the E company. I can conceive that there might be a limited company formed and registered by a person who had the sole interest in it, the other subscribing members being persons who were his aliases, and having no real existence; and in that case also (which does not occur here) there would be no legal company, and the real owner of the concern would be liable for its debts to the full extent of his means.

F The provisions of the Act of 1862 which seem to me to have any bearing upon this point lie within a very narrow compass. Section 6 [Companies Act, 1948, s. 1] provides that any seven or more persons, associated for a lawful purpose, such as the manufacture and sale of boots, may, by subscribing their names to a memorandum of association and otherwise complying with the provisions of the Act in respect of registration, form a company with or without limited liability; and s. 8 [s. 2 (4) G (b) of the Act of 1948], which prescribes the essentials of the memorandum in the case of a company limited by shares, inter alia, enacts that "no subscriber shall take less than one share." The first of these enactments does not require that the persons subscribing shall not be related to each other, and the second plainly imports that the holding of a single share affords a sufficient qualification for membership; and I can find no other rule laid down or even suggested in the Act. Nor I does the statute, either expressly or by implication impose any limit upon the number of shares which a single member may subscribe for or take by allotment. At the date of registration all the requirements of the Act had been complied with, and, as matters then stood, there does not appear to have been any room for the pleas now advanced by the liquidator. The company was still free to modify or reject the agreement of July 20, and the fraud of which the appellant has been I held guilty by the Court of Appeal, though it may have existed in animo, had not been carried into execution by the acceptance of the agreement, the issue of debentures to the appellant under the terms of it, and by his receiving an allotment of shares which increased his interest in the company to <sup>20001</sup><sub>20007</sub> of its actual capital.

I have already intimated my opinion that the acceptance of the agreement is binding on the company; and neither that acceptance, nor the preponderating share of the appellant, nor his payment in debentures, being forbidden by the Act, I do not think that any of those things could subsequently render the registration of the company invalid. But I am willing to assume that proceedings which are permitted by the Act may be so used by the members of a limited company as to constitute a fraud upon others, to whom they in consequence incur personal liability. In this case the fraud is found to have been committed by the appellant against the creditors of the company, but it is clear that, if so, though he may have been its originator and the only person who took benefit from it, he could not have done any of those things which, taken together, are said to constitute his fraud without the consent and privity of the other shareholders. It seems doubtful whether a liquidator, as representing and in the name of the company, can sue its members for redress against a fraud which was committed by the company itself and by all its shareholders. A

However, I do not think it necessary to dwell upon that point, because I am not satisfied that the charge of fraud against creditors has any foundation in fact. The memorandum of association gave notice that the main object for which the company was formed was to adopt, and carry into effect, with or without modifications, the agreement of July 20, 1892, under the terms of which the debentures for £10,000 were subsequently given to the appellant in part payment of the price. By the articles of association—art. 62 (e)—the directors were empowered to issue mortgage or other debentures or bonds for any debts due, or to become due, to the company, and it is not alleged or proved that there was any failure to comply with s. 43 or the other clauses of Part III of the Act [Companies Act, 1948, Part III, ss. 110 et seq.] which relate to the protection of creditors. The unpaid creditors of the company, whose unfortunate position has been attributed to the fraud of the appellant, if they had thought fit to avail themselves of the means of protecting their interests which the Act provides, could have informed themselves of the terms of purchase by the company, of the issue of debentures to the appellant, and of the amount of shares held by each member. In my opinion the statute casts upon them the duty of making inquiry in regard to these matters. Whatever may be the moral duty of a limited company and its shareholders, when the trade of the company is not thriving, the law does not lay any obligation upon them to warn those members of the public who deal with them on credit that they run the risk of not being paid. One of the learned judges asserts, and I see no reason to question the accuracy of his statement, that creditors never think of examining the register of debentures. But the apathy of a creditor cannot justify an imputation of fraud against a limited company or its members, who have provided all the means of information which the Act of 1862 requires. And, in my opinion, a creditor who will not take the trouble to use the means which the statute provides for enabling him to protect himself must bear the consequences of his own negligence. C

For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the orders appealed from ought to be reversed, with costs to the appellant here and in both courts below. His costs in this House must, of course, be taxed in accordance with the rule applicable to pauper litigants. H

LORD HERSCHELL.—By an order of the High Court, which was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, it was declared that the respondent company, or the liquidator of that company, was entitled to be indemnified by the appellant against the sum of £7,733 8s. 3d., and it was ordered that the respondent company should recover that sum against the appellant. On July 28, 1892, the respondent company was incorporated with a capital of £40,000, divided into 40,000 shares of £1 each. One of the objects for which the company was incorporated was to carry out an agreement, with such modifications therein as might be agreed to, of July 20, 1892, which had been entered into between the appellant and a trustee for a company intended to be formed for the acquisition by the company of the business then carried on by the appellant. The company was in fact formed for the purpose of taking over the appellant's business of leather merchant and boot manufacturer, which he had I

A carried on for many years. The business had been a prosperous one, and, as the learned judge who tried the action found, was solvent at the time when the company was incorporated. The memorandum of association of the company was subscribed by the appellant, his wife and daughter, and his four sons, each subscribing for one share. The appellant afterwards had 20,000 shares allotted to him. For these he paid £1 per share out of the purchase money which, by agree-
B ment, he was to receive for the transfer of his business to the company.

The company afterwards became insolvent and went into liquidation. In an action brought by a debenture-holder on behalf of himself and all the other debenture-holders, including the appellant, the respondent company set up by way of counterclaim that the company was formed by the appellant, and the debentures were issued in order that he might carry on the said business and take all the profits without risk to himself, that the company was the mere nominee and agent of the
C appellant, and that the company or the liquidator thereof was entitled to be indemnified by him against all the debts owing by the company to creditors other than the appellant. This counterclaim was not in the pleading as originally delivered; it was inserted by way of amendment at the suggestion of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., before whom the action came on for trial. The learned judge thought the liquidator
D entitled to the relief asked for and made the order complained of. He was of opinion that the company was only an alias for Salomon: that, the intention being that he should take the profits without running the risk of the debts, the company was merely an agent for him, and, having incurred liabilities at his instance, was, like any other agent under such circumstances, entitled to be indemnified by him against them.

E On appeal the decision of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, that court "being of opinion that the formation of the company, the agree-
F ment of August, 1892, and the issue of debentures to Aron Salomon pursuant to such agreement were a mere scheme to enable him to carry on business in the name of the company with limited liability contrary to the true intent and meaning of the Companies Act, 1862, and further, to enable him to obtain a preference over other creditors of the company by procuring a first charge on the assets of the company by means of such debentures." The learned judges in the Court of Appeal dissented from the view taken by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., that the company
G was to be regarded as the agent of the appellant. They considered the relation between them to be that of trustee and cestui que trust, but this difference of view, of course, did not affect the conclusion that the right to the indemnity claimed had been established.

It is to be observed that both courts treated the company as a legal entity distinct from Salomon and the then members who composed it, and, therefore, as a validly constituted corporation. This is, indeed, necessarily involved in the judgment which declared that the company were entitled to certain rights as against Salomon.
H Under these circumstances, I am at a loss to understand what is meant by saying that A. Salomon & Co., Ltd., is but an alias for A. Salomon. It is not another name for the same person; the company is ex hypothesi a distinct legal persona. As little am I able to adopt the view that the company was the agent of Salomon to carry on his business for him. In a popular sense a company may in every case be said to carry on business for and on behalf of its shareholders, but this certainly
I does not in point of law constitute the relation of principal and agent between them or render the shareholders liable to indemnify the company against the debts which it incurs. Here, it is true, Salomon owned all the shares except six, so that, if the business were profitable, he would be entitled substantially to the whole of the profits. The other shareholders, too, are said to have been "dummies," the nominees of Salomon. But when once it is conceded that they were individual members of the company distinct from Salomon, and sufficiently so to bring into existence in conjunction with him a validly constituted corporation, I am unable to see how the facts to which I have just referred can affect the legal position of the company, or give it rights as against its members which it would not otherwise possess. A

The Court of Appeal based their judgment on the proposition that the formation of the company, and all that followed it, was a mere scheme to enable the appellant to carry on business in the name of the company, with limited liability, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the Companies Act, 1862. The conclusion which they drew from this premise was, that the company was a trustee and Salomon B their cestui que trust. I cannot think that the conclusion follows even if the premise be sound. It seems to me that the logical result would be that the company had not been validly constituted, and, therefore, had no legal existence.

But, apart from this, it is necessary to examine the proposition on which the court have rested their judgment, as its effect would be far reaching. Many industrial and banking concerns of the highest standing and credit have, in recent years, C been, to use a common expression, converted into joint stock companies, and often into what are called "private" companies, where the whole of the shares are held by the former partners. It appears to me that all these might be pronounced "schemes to enable" them "to carry on business in the name of the company, with limited liability," in the very sense in which those words are used in the judgment of the Court of Appeal. The profits of the concern carried on by the company will go to D the persons whose business it was before the transfer, and in the same proportions as before, the only difference being that the liability of those who take the profits will no longer be unlimited. The very object of the creation of the company, and the transfer to it of the business, is that, whereas the liability of the partners for debts incurred was without limit, the liability of the members for the debts incurred E by the company shall be limited. In no other respect is it intended that there shall be any difference; the conduct of the business and the division of the profits are intended to be the same as before. If the judgment of the Court of Appeal be pushed to its logical conclusion all these companies must, I think, be held to be trustees for the partners who transferred the business to them, and those partners must be declared liable, without limit, to discharge the debts of the company. F For this is the effect of the judgment as regards the respondent company. The position of the members of a company is just the same whether they are declared liable to pay the debts incurred by the company, or by way of indemnity to furnish the company with the means of paying them. I do not think that the learned judges in the court below have contemplated the application of their judgment to such cases as I have been considering, but I can see no solid distinction between those G cases and the present one.

It is said that the respondent company is a "one-man" company, and that in this respect it differs from such companies as those to which I have referred. But it has often happened that a business transferred to a joint stock company has been the property of three or four persons only, and that the other subscribers of the memorandum have been clerks or other persons who possessed little or no interest H in the concern. I am unable to see how it can be lawful for three or four or six persons to form a company for the purpose of employing their capital in trading, with the benefit of limited liability, and not for one person to do so, provided in each case the requirements of the statute have been complied with, and the company has been validly constituted. How does it concern the creditor whether the capital of the company is owned by seven persons in equal shares, with the right I to an equal share of the profits, or whether it is almost entirely owned by one person who takes practically the whole of the profits? The creditor has notice that he is dealing with a company the liability of the members of which is limited, and the register of shareholders informs him how the shares are held, and that they are substantially in the hands of one person, if this be the fact.

The creditors in the present case gave credit to and contracted with a limited company; the effect of the decision is to give them the benefit as regards one of the shareholders, of unlimited liability. I have said that the liability of persons

A carrying on business can only be limited provided the requirements of the statute be complied with, and this leads naturally to the inquiry what are those requirements? The Court of Appeal has declared that the formation of the respondent company, and the agreement to take over the business of the appellant, were a scheme "contrary to the true intent and meaning of the Companies Act." I know B of no means of ascertaining what is the intent and meaning of the Companies Act except by examining its provisions and finding what regulations it has imposed as a condition of trading with limited liability. The memorandum must state the amount of the capital of the company and the number of shares into which it is divided, and no subscriber is to take less than one share [Companies Act, 1948, C s. 2 (4) (a) (b)]. The shares may, however, be of as small a nominal value as those who form the company please; the statute prescribes no minimum, and though there must be seven shareholders, it is enough if each of them holds one share, however small its denomination.

The legislature, therefore, clearly sanctions a scheme by which all the shares, except six, are owned by a single individual, and these six are of a value little more than nominal. It was said that in the present case the six shareholders other than D the appellant were mere dummies, his nominees, and held their shares in trust for him. I will assume that this was so. In my opinion, it makes no difference. The statute forbids the entry in the register of any trust [s. 117 of Act of 1948], and it certainly contains no enactment that each of the seven persons subscribing the memorandum must be beneficially entitled to the share or shares for which he subscribes. The persons who subscribe the memorandum or who have agreed to become E members of the company, and whose names are on the register, are alone regarded as, and, in fact, are, the shareholders. They are subject to all the liability which attaches to the holding of the share. They can be compelled to make any payment which the ownership of a share involves. Whether they are beneficial owners or bare trustees is a matter with which neither the company nor creditors have anything to do; it concerns only them and their cestuis que trust if they have any.

F If, then, in the present case all the requirements of the statute were complied with and a company was effectually constituted, and this is the hypothesis of the judgment appealed from, what warrant is there for saying that what was done was contrary to the true intent and meaning of the Companies Act? It may be that a company constituted like that under consideration was not in the contemplation of the legislature at the time when the Act authorising limited liability was passed;
G that if what is possible under the enactments as they stand had been foreseen, a minimum sum would have been fixed as the least denomination of share permissible, and it would have been made a condition that each of the seven persons should have a substantial interest in the company. But we have to interpret the law, not to make it; and it must be remembered that no one need trust a limited liability company unless he so please, and that before he does so he can ascertain, if he so H please, what is the capital of the company, and how it is held.

I have hitherto made no reference to the debentures which the appellant received in part payment of the purchase money of the business which he transferred to the company. These are referred to in the judgment as part of the scheme which is pronounced contrary to the true intent and meaning of the Companies Act. But if apart from this the conclusion that the appellant is bound to indemnify the I company against its debts cannot be sustained, I do not see how the circumstance that he received these debentures can avail the respondent company. The issue of debentures to the vendor of a business as part of the price is certainly open to great abuse, and has often worked grave mischief. It may well be that some check should be placed upon the practice, and that at all events, ample notice to all who may have dealings with the company should be secured. But as the law at present stands there is certainly nothing unlawful in the creation of such debentures.
For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the appeal should be allowed.
It was contended on behalf of the company that the agreement between them and the appellant ought at all events, to be set aside on the ground of fraud. In my opinion, no such case has been made out, and I do not think that the respondent company are entitled to any such relief. A

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I cannot help thinking that the appellant, Aron Salomon, has been dealt with somewhat hardly in this case. Mr. Salomon, who is now suing as a pauper, was a wealthy man in July, 1892. He was a boot and shoe manufacturer, trading on his own sole account under the firm of "A. Salomon & Co.," in High Street, Whitechapel, where he had extensive warehouses and a large establishment. He had been in the trade over thirty years. He had lived in the same neighbourhood all along, and for many years past he had occupied the same premises. So far things had gone very well with him. Beginning with little or no capital he had gradually built up a thriving business, and he was undoubtedly in good credit and repute. It is impossible to say exactly what the value of the business was. But there was a substantial surplus of assets over liabilities. And it seems to me to be pretty clear that, if Mr. Salomon had been minded to dispose of his business in the market as a going concern, he might fairly have counted upon retiring with at least £10,000 in his pocket. Mr. Salomon, however, did not want to part with the business. He had a wife and a family consisting of five sons and a daughter. Four of the sons were working with their father. The eldest, who was about thirty years of age, was practically the manager. But the sons were not partners; they were only servants. Not unnaturally, perhaps, they were dissatisfied with their position. They kept pressing their father to give them a share in the concern. "They troubled me," says Mr. Salomon, "all the while." So at length Mr. Salomon did what hundreds of others have done under similar circumstances; he turned his business into a limited company. He wanted, he says, to extend the business and make provision for his family. In those words, I think, he fairly describes the principal motives which influenced his action. B

All the usual formalities were gone through; all the requirements of the Companies Act, 1862, were duly observed. There was a contract with a trustee in the usual form for the sale of the business to a company about to be formed. There was a memorandum of association duly signed and registered, stating that the company was formed to carry that contract into effect, and fixing the capital at £40,000 in 40,000 shares of £1 each. There were articles of association providing the usual machinery for conducting the business. The first directors were to be nominated by the majority of the subscribers to the memorandum of association. The directors, when appointed, were authorised to exercise all such powers of the company as were not by statute or by the articles required to be exercised in general meeting; and there was express power to borrow on debentures, with the limitation that the borrowing was not to exceed £10,000 without the sanction of a general meeting. The company was intended from the first to be a private company; it remained a private company to the end. No prospectus was issued; no invitation to take shares was ever addressed to the public. The subscribers to the memorandum were Mr. Salomon, his wife, and five of his children who were grown up. The subscribers met and appointed Mr. Salomon and his two elder sons directors. F
H

The directors then proceeded to carry out the proposed transfer. By an agreement dated Aug. 2, 1892, the company adopted the preliminary contract, and in accordance with it the business was taken over by the company as from June 1, 1892. The price fixed by the contract was duly paid. The price on paper was extravagant. It amounted to over £39,000, a sum which represented the sanguine expectations of a fond owner rather than anything that can be called a businesslike or reasonable estimate of value. That, no doubt, is a circumstance which, at first sight, calls for observation, but when the facts of the case and the position of the parties are considered, it is difficult to see what bearing it has on the question before your Lordships. The purchase money was paid in this way. As money came in sums amounting to £20,000 were paid to Mr. Salomon, and then immediately returned I

A to the company in exchange for fully-paid shares. The sum of £10,000 was paid in debentures for the like amount. The balance, with the exception of about £1,000, which Mr. Salomon seems to have received and retained went in discharge of the debts and liabilities of the business at the time of the transfer, which were thus entirely wiped off. In the result, therefore, Mr. Salomon received for his business about £1,000 in cash, £10,000 in debentures and half the nominal capital of the company in fully-paid shares for what they were worth. No other shares were issued except the seven shares taken by the subscribers to the memorandum, who, of course, knew all the circumstances, and had, therefore, no ground for complaint on the score of over-valuation.

B The company had a brief career; it fell upon evil days. Shortly after it was started there seems to have come a period of great depression in the boot and shoe trade. There were strikes of workmen too, and in view of that danger, contracts with public bodies, which were the principal source of Mr. Salomon's profit, were split up and divided between different firms. The attempts made to push the business on behalf of the new company crammed its warehouses with unsaleable stock. Mr. Salomon seems to have done what he could; both he and his wife lent the company money, and then he got his debentures cancelled and re-issued to a Mr. Broderip, who advanced him £5,000, which he immediately handed over to the company on loan. The temporary relief only hastened ruin. Mr. Broderip's interest was not paid when it became due. He took proceedings at once and got a receiver appointed. Then, of course, came liquidation and a forced sale of the company's assets. They realised enough to pay Mr. Broderip, but not enough to pay the debentures in full, and the unsecured creditors were consequently left out in the cold. In this state of things the liquidator met Mr. Broderip's claim by a counterclaim, to which he made Mr. Salomon defendant. He disputed the validity of the debentures on the ground of fraud. On the same ground he claimed rescission of the agreement for the transfer of the business, cancellation of the debentures, and repayment by Mr. Salomon of the balance of the purchase money. In the alternative he claimed payment of £20,000 on Mr. Salomon's shares, alleging that nothing had been paid on them.

When the trial came on before VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., the validity of Mr. Broderip's claim was admitted, and it was not disputed that the 20,000 shares were fully paid up. The case presented by the liquidator broke down completely. But the learned judge suggested that the company had a right of indemnity against Mr. Salomon. The signatories of the memorandum of association were, he said, mere nominees of Mr. Salomon, mere dummies. The company was Mr. Salomon in another form. He used the name of the company as an alias. He employed the company as his agent; so the company, he thought, was entitled to indemnity against its principal. The counterclaim was, accordingly, amended to raise this point, and on the amendment being made the learned judge pronounced an order in accordance with the view he had expressed.

I The order of the learned judge appears to me to be founded on a misconception of the scope and effect of the Companies Act, 1862. In order to form a company limited by shares, the Act requires that a memorandum of association should be signed by seven persons, who are each to take one share at least. If those conditions are complied with, what can it matter whether the signatories are relations or strangers? There is nothing in the Act requiring that the subscribers to the memorandum should be independent or unconnected, or that they or any one of them should take a substantial interest in the undertaking, or that they should have a mind and will of their own, as one of the learned lords justices seems to think, or that there should be anything like a balance of power in the constitution of the company. In almost every company that is formed, the statutory number is eked out by clerks or friends, who sign their names at the request of the promoter or promoters without intending to take any further part or interest in the matter.

When the memorandum is duly signed and registered, though there be only seven shares taken, the subscribers are a body corporate "capable forthwith" to use the words of the enactments, "of exercising all the functions of an incorporated company" [Companies Act, 1948, s. 13 (2)]. Those are strong words. The company attains maturity on its birth. There is no period of minority; no interval of incapacity. I cannot understand how a body corporate thus made "capable" by statute can lose its individuality by issuing the bulk of its capital to one person, whether he be a subscriber to the memorandum or not. The company is at law a different person altogether from the subscribers to the memorandum, and, though it may be that after incorporation the business is precisely the same as it was before, the same persons are managers, and the same hands receive the profits, the company is not in law the agent of the subscribers or trustee for them. Nor are the subscribers as members liable, in any shape or form, except to the extent and in the manner provided by the Act. That is, I think, the declared intention of the enactment. If the view of the learned judge were sound, it would follow that no common law partnership could register as a company limited by shares without remaining subject to unlimited liability.

Mr. Salomon appealed, but his appeal was dismissed with costs, though the appellate court did not entirely accept the view of the court below. The decision of the Court of Appeal proceeds on a declaration of opinion embodied in the order which has been already read. I must say that I, too, have great difficulty in understanding this declaration. If it only means that Mr. Salomon availed himself to the full of the advantages offered by the Companies Act, 1862, what is there wrong in that? Leave out the words "contrary to the true intent and meaning of the Companies Act, 1862," and bear in mind that "the creditors of the company" are not the creditors of Mr. Salomon, and the declaration is perfectly innocent. It has no sting in it. In an early case (Re Baglan Hall Colliery Co. (2)) which in some of its aspects is not unlike the present, the owners of a colliery (to quote the language of GIFFARD, L.J., in the Court of Appeal) "went on working the colliery not very successfully, and then determined to form a limited company, in order to avoid incurring further personal liability." The lord justice adds: "It was the policy of the Companies Act to enable this to be done." And so he reversed the decision of MALINS, V.-C., who had expressed an opinion that if the laws of the country sanctioned such a proceeding they were "in a most lamentable state," and had fixed the former owners with liability for the amount of the shares they took in exchange for their property.

Among the principal reasons which induce persons to form private companies as is stated very clearly by MR. PALMER in his treatise on the subject, are the desire to avoid the risk of bankruptcy, and the increased facility afforded for borrowing money. By means of a private company, as MR. PALMER observes, a trade can be carried on with limited liability and without exposing the persons interested in it in the event of failure to the harsh provisions of the bankruptcy law. A company too can raise money on debentures which an ordinary trader cannot do; any member of a company acting in good faith is as much entitled to take and hold the company's debentures as any outside creditor. Every creditor is entitled to get and to hold the best security the law allows him to take. If, however, the declaration of the Court of Appeal means that Mr. Salomon acted fraudulently or dishonestly, I must say that I can find nothing in the evidence to support such an imputation. The purpose for which Mr. Salomon and the other subscribers to the memorandum were associated was "lawful." The fact that Mr. Salomon raised £5,000 for the company on debentures that belonged to him seems to me strong evidence of his good faith and of his confidence in the company.

The unsecured creditors of A. Salomon & Co., Ltd., may be entitled to sympathy, but they have only themselves to blame for their misfortunes. They trusted the company, I suppose, because they had long dealt with Mr. Salomon and he had always paid his way; but they had full notice that they were no longer dealing with

A an individual, and they must be taken to have been cognisant of the memorandum and of the articles of association. For such a catastrophe as has occurred in this case some would blame the law that allows such a thing as a floating charge. But a floating charge is too convenient a form of security to be lightly abolished. I have long thought, and I believe some of your Lordships also think, that the ordinary trade creditors of a trading company ought to have a preferential claim
B on the assets in liquidation in respect of debts incurred within a certain limited time before the winding-up. But that is not the law at present. Everybody knows that when there is a winding-up, debenture holders generally step in and sweep off everything. And a great scandal it is.

It has become the fashion to call companies of this class "one-man companies." That is a taking nickname, but it does not help one much in the way of argument.
C If it is intended to convey the meaning that a company which is under the absolute control of one person is not a company legally incorporated, although the requirements of the Act of 1862 may have been complied with, it is inaccurate and misleading; if it merely means that there is a predominant partner possessing an overwhelming influence and entitled practically to the whole of the profits, there is
D nothing in that that I can see contrary to the true intention of the Act of 1862, or against public policy, or detrimental to the interests of creditors. If the shares are fully paid up it cannot matter whether they are in the hands of one or many. If the shares are not fully paid it is as easy to gauge the solvency of an individual as to estimate the financial ability of a crowd.

One argument was addressed to your Lordships which ought perhaps to be noticed although it was not the ground of decision in either of the courts below.
E It was argued that the agreement for the transfer of the business to the company ought to be set aside, because there was no independent board of directors, and the property was transferred at an over-value. There are, it seems to me, two answers to that argument. In the first place, the directors did just what they were authorised to do by the memorandum of association. There was no fraud or misrepresentation and there was nobody deceived. In the second place the company have put
F it out of their power to restore the property which was transferred to them. It was said that the assets were sold by an order made in the presence of Mr. Salomon, though not with his consent, which declared that the sale was to be without prejudice to the rights claimed by the company by their counterclaim. I cannot see what difference that makes. The reservation in the order seems to me to be simply G nugatory. I am of opinion that the appeal ought to be allowed and the counterclaim of the company dismissed with costs, both here and below.

LORD MORRIS.—I quite concur in the decision which has been announced and in the reasons which have been so fully given for it.

LORD DAVEY.—It is possible, and (I think) probable, that the conclusion to H which I feel constrained to come in this case may not have been contemplated by the legislature, and may be due to some defect in the machinery of the Act. But, after all, the intention of the legislature must be collected from the language of its enactments, and I do not see my way to holding that, if there are seven registered members, the association is not a company formed in compliance with the provisions of the Act, and capable of carrying on business with limited liability
I either because the bulk of the shares are held by some only, or even one of the members, and the others are what is called "dummies," holding, it may be, only one share of £1 each, or because there are less than seven persons who are beneficially entitled to the shares. I think that this result follows from the absence of any provision fixing a minimum nominal amount of a share, the provision in s. 8 of the Companies Act, 1862 [s. 2 (4) (b) of Act of 1948] that no subscriber shall take less than one share, and the provision in s. 30 [s. 117 of Act of 1948] that no notice of any trust shall be entered on the register. With regard to the latter provision, it would, in my opinion, be impossible to work the machinery of the Act on any other principle, and to attempt to do so would lead only to confusion and uncertainty. A

The learned counsel for the respondents (wisely, as I think), did not lay any stress on the members, other than the appellant, being trustees for him of their shares. Their argument was that they were "dummies," and did not hold a substantial interest in the company—i.e., what a jury would say is a substantial interest. In the language of some of the judges in the court below, any jury, if asked the question, would say the business was Aron Salomon's, and no one else's. It was not argued in this case that there was no association of seven persons to be registered and that the registration, therefore, operated nothing, or that the so-called company was a sham and might be disregarded. And, indeed, it would have been difficult for the learned counsel for the respondents appearing, as they did, at your Lordships' Bar for the company who had been permitted to litigate in the courts below as actors on their counterclaim, to contend that their clients were non-existent. I do not say that such an argument ought to or would prevail; I only observe that, having regard to the decisions, it is not certain that s. 18 [s. 15 (1) of Act of 1948], making the certificate of the registrar conclusive evidence that all the requisitions of the Act in respect of registration had been complied with, would be an answer to it. B C D

We start, then, with the assumption that the respondents have a corporate existence with power to sue and be sued, to incur debts and be wound-up, and to act as agents or as trustees, and I suppose, therefore, to hold property. Both the courts below have, however, held that the appellant is liable to indemnify the company against all its debts and liabilities. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., held that the company was an alias for the appellant, who carried on his business through the company as his agent, and that he was bound to indemnify his own agent, and he arrived at this conclusion on the ground that the other members of the company had no substantial interest in it, and the business in substance was the appellant's. The Court of Appeal thought the relation of the company to the appellant was that of trustee to cestui que trust. The ground on which the learned judges seem to have chiefly relied was that it was an attempt by an individual to carry on his business with limited liability, which was forbidden by the Act and unlawful. I observe in passing that nothing turns upon there being only one person interested. The argument would have been just as good if there had been six members holding the bulk of the shares and one member with a very small interest, say, one share. E F

I am at a loss to see how in either view taken in the courts below the conclusion follows from the premises, or in what way the company became an agent or trustee for the appellant, except in the sense in which every company may loosely and inaccurately be said to be an agent for earning profits for its members, or a trustee of its profits for the members amongst whom they are to be divided. There was certainly no express trust for the appellant, and an implied or constructive trust can only be raised by virtue of some equity. I took the liberty of asking the learned counsel what the equity was, but got no answer. By an alias is usually understood a second name for one individual, but here, as one of your Lordships has already observed, we have, ex hypothesi, a duly formed legal persona, with corporate attributes, and capable of incurring legal liabilities. Nor do I think it legitimate to inquire whether the interest of any member is substantial when the Act has declared that no member need hold more than one share, and has not prescribed any minimum amount of a share. If, as was said in the Court of Appeal, the company was formed for an unlawful purpose, or in order to achieve an object not permitted by the provisions of the Act, the appropriate remedy (if any) would seem to be to set aside the certificate of incorporation, or to treat the company as a nullity, or, if the appellant has committed a fraud or misdemeanour (which I do not think he has), he may be proceeded against civilly or criminally; but how either of these states of circumstances creates the relation of cestui que trust and trustee, or principal and agent, between the appellant and respondents, is not apparent to my understanding. G H I

A I am, therefore, of opinion that the order appealed from cannot be supported on the grounds stated by the learned judges. But counsel for the respondent company also relied on the alternative relief claimed by his pleadings, which was quite open to him here, viz., that the contract for purchase of the appellant's business ought to be set aside for fraud. The fraud seems to consist in the alleged exorbitance of the price, and the fact that there was no independent board of directors with whom the

B appellant could contract. I am of opinion that the fraud was not made out. I do not think the price of the appellant's business (which seems to have been a genuine one, and for some time a prosperous business) was so excessive as to afford grounds for rescission, and as regards the cash portion of the price it must be observed that as the appellant held the bulk of the shares, or (the respondents say) was the only shareholder, the money required for the payment of it came from himself in

C the form either of calls on his shares or profits which would otherwise be divisible.

Nor was the absence of any independent board material in a case like the present. I think it an inevitable inference from the circumstances of the case that every member of the company assented to the purchase, and the company is bound in a matter intra vires by the unanimous agreement of its members. In fact, it is impossible to say who was defrauded. Counsel relied on some dicta in Erlanger v.

D New Sombrero Phosphate Co. (1), a case which is often quoted and not unfrequently misunderstood. Of course LORD CAIRNS' observations were directed only to a case such as he had before him, where it was attempted to bind a large body of shareholders by a contract which purported to have been made between the vendor and the directors before the shares were offered for subscription, whereas it appeared that the directors were only the nominees of the vendor, who had accepted his

E bidding, and exercised no judgment of their own. It has nothing to do with the present case. That a company may contract with the holder of the bulk of its shares, and such contract will be binding, though carried only by the votes of that shareholder, was decided in North-West Transportation Co. v. Beatty (3).

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appellant's appeal should be allowed and the cross appeal should be dismissed. I agree to the proposed order as to costs.

F

In the original appeal, order appealed from reversed, with costs below, and such costs in this House as are appropriate in the case of a pauper appeal. In the cross-appeal, order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs to the same extent.

ALLEN v. FLOOD AND ANOTHER

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Halsbury, L.C., Lord Watson, Lord Ashbourne, Lord Herschell, Lord Maenaghten, Lord Morris, Lord Shand, Lord Davey and Lord James of Hereford), December 10, 12, 16, 17, 1895, March 25, 26, 29, 30, April 1, 2, June 3, December 14, 1897]

Tort—Procurement of unlawful act—Procurement of lawful act by unlawful means—Materiality of motive—Action against trade union—Competency—Procurement by official of dismissal of plaintiffs—No breach of contract by employer.

An act which in itself is lawful cannot be converted into a legal wrong because it was done with a bad motive.

A person who procures the act of another can be made legally responsible for the consequences of that act if he knowingly and for his own ends induces that other person to commit an actionable wrong, or, when the act induced is within the right of the immediate actor and so is not wrongful so far as he is concerned, if the inducer can be shown to have procured his object by illegal means against the third party, as, e.g., by fraud. But a person who suffers loss by reason of another doing or not doing some act which that other is entitled to do or abstain from doing at his own will and pleasure, whatever his motive may be, has no remedy against a further person who, by persuasion or some other means not in themselves unlawful, has brought about the act or omission from which the loss comes, even though that person was actuated by malice against the person injured and his conduct was without justification or excuse.

F

Accordingly, where the appellant, the representative of a trade union, informed an employer that, unless he discharged the respondents, who were working for him, the members of the union in his employment would immediately cease to work for him, there being no contractual relationship between the employer and his workers which would render it a breach of contract if the union men left the employment, or if the employer dismissed the respondents, without longer notice,

G

Held: the respondents were not entitled to maintain an action against the appellant for damages for intimidating and coercing the employer to terminate their employment, it being immaterial whether his motive in approaching the employer was a proper one, namely, to advance the interests of the members of his union, or an improper one, his object being to punish the respondents for acts which they had done some time previously of which the union disapproved.

H

Notes. So far as trade unions are concerned it is to be borne in mind that s. 3 of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906 (25 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 1267), provides that an act done in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute shall not be actionable on the ground only that it induces some other person to break a contract of employment or is an interference with the trade, business, or employment of some other person.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., LOPES and RIGBY, L.JJ.), reported [1895] 2 Q.B. 21, affirming a decision of KENNEDY, J., on further consideration of an action, tried by him with a jury, in which the respondents, as plaintiffs, claimed damages from the appellant for "intimidating and coercing" the Glengall Iron Co. to terminate the respondents' employment and not to enter into further contracts to employ them. I

The respondents, Flood and Taylor, were shipwrights, who for several years previous to the month of April, 1894, had been, and then were, pursuing their calling in the port of London, each having served an apprenticeship to that calling with the Glengall Iron Co., under the superintendence of Mr. Edmonds, the foreman of the company's works at their Regent Dock. As apprentices they were taught, as part of the calling of shipwrights, to do both wood and iron work to all kinds of

A ships—wooden, composite, and iron. In the northern ports of England the wood and iron work was almost universally done by separate sets of men, and the same practice prevailed in some of the London docks, among them the Glengall Co.'s Regent Dock, where ships of all kinds were docked and repaired. There were, however, other of those docks, among them Mills and Knight's Nelson Dock at Rotherhithe, in which both wood and iron work were usually done by the same shipwrights. There the respondents sometimes found employment. At the Glengall Regent Dock they were also frequently employed, but there, from first to last, they worked at wood work only, and they were so working on the morning of April 13, 1894, on the Sam Weller, then in dock for repairs. They were engaged to work by the day, being entitled to leave the employment at the end of any day, and, on the other hand, being subject to the risk that their employers might similarly at any time cease to employ them. A body of iron workers commonly called "boilermakers" were engaged for the iron work, the terms of their employment being the same as those of the respondents. The job on the Sam Weller was expected to last about a fortnight, and there was every reason to suppose the respondents would, but for the action of the appellant, have been continued upon it until it was finished. The appellant was by trade a boilermaker, and at the time in question was a member and the London delegate of the Independent Society of Boilermakers and Iron and Steel Shipbuilders, consisting of about 40,000 members. He was not employed on the Glengall Co.'s works. A number of boilermakers, members of the society, were employed by the Glengall Co. on the Sam Weller. It appeared that for a period of four months, terminating on April 11, the respondents had been working at the Nelson Dock of Mills and Knight, and that fact became known to a man named Elliott, a member of the Boilermakers' Society, and one of those working in iron work on the Sam Weller. On the morning of April 13 the appellant, at the request of Elliott, came to see him at the Regent Dock, and had some conversation with him respecting the respondents. He afterwards had an interview with Mr. Halkett, the managing director of the Glengall Co., in his office. The appellant said that he had received word by some of the boilermakers working in the company's yard that they wanted to see him, and that he had had an interview with them, and they told him that the company had two shipwrights, the respondents, in their employment who were known to have done iron work in Mills and Knight's yard, and that, unless those two men were discharged from their employment that day, all the boilermakers belonging to the society would on that day leave off work. Mr. Halkett said that it was very hard to be interfered with, and that the respondents were not doing iron work in the company's yard. The appellant thereupon said: "We are doing our best to put an end to the practice of doing iron work by shipwrights," adding that it was not from any ill-feeling against the employers, nor against any men in particular, but that his society had made up their minds that, wherever it was known that any shipwrights had been engaged doing iron work, the boilermakers would cease work on the same ship in the same employment. With regard to the respondents, he said that they were known, and wherever they were employed the same action would be taken there as in that place. In consequence of that interview, Mr. Halkett, in Allen's presence, gave instructions that the respondents were to be discharged. On the same day the respondents were discharged, and were not again employed by the Glengall Co.

Dec. 10, 12, 16, 17, 1895.—The case came on for argument before LORD HALSBURY, L.C., and LORDS WATSON, HERSCHELL, MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, SHAND, and DAVEY. At the conclusion of the argument their Lordships stated that they required further argument and also to consult the judges.

Mar. 25, 26, 29, 30, April 1, 2, 1897, the case was re-argued before the same noble and learned Lords, with the addition of LORD ASHBOURNE and LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD. The judges were summoned, and HAWKINS, MATHEW, CAVE, NORTH, WILLS, GRANTHAM, LAWRENCE, and WRIGHT, JJ., attended, the question being submitted to them: "Assuming the evidence given by the [respondents'] witnesses A to be correct, was there any evidence of a cause of action fit to be left to the jury?"

Cohen, Q.C., Robson, Q.C., and E. Morten for the appellant.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Rufus Isaacs for the respondents.

June 3, 1897. The judges delivered their opinions, HAWKINS, CAVE, NORTH, WILLS, B
GRANTHAM and LAWRENCE, JJ., answering the question put to them in the affirmative, while MATHEW and WRIGHT, JJ., answered it in the negative. Their Lordships thanked the judges for their opinions, and themselves took time for consideration.

Dec. 14, 1897. The following opinions were read.

the defendants for having maliciously and wrongfully, and with intent to injure the plaintiffs, intimidated and coerced their employers to break contracts and not to enter into contracts with them, whereby the plaintiffs suffered damage.

The first objection made to the plaintiffs' right to recover for the loss which they undoubtedly suffered is that no right of the plaintiffs was infringed, and that the D right contended for on their behalf is not a right recognised by law, or at all events only such a right that everyone else is entitled to deprive them of it if they stop short of physical violence or obstruction. I think the right to employ their labour as they will is a right both recognised by the law and sufficiently guarded by its provisions to make any undue interference with that right an actionable wrong. E Very early authorities in the law have recognised the right, and, in my view, no authority can be found which questions or qualifies it. The schoolmaster who complained that his scholars were being assaulted and brought an action; the quarry-owner who complained that his servants were being menaced and molested, were both held to have a right of action. And it appears to me that the importance of those cases, and the principle established by them, have not been sufficiently F considered. It is said that threats of violence or of actual violence were unlawful means; the lawfulness of the means I will discuss hereafter. But the point on which these cases are important is the existence of the right. It was not the schoolmaster who was assaulted, it was not the quarry-owner who was assaulted or threatened; but, nevertheless, the schoolmaster was held entitled to bring an action in respect of the loss of scholars attending his school, and the quarry-owner in respect of the loss of workmen to his quarry. They were third persons; G
no violence or threats were applied to them, and the cause of action, which they had a right to insist on, was the indirect effect upon themselves of violence and threats applied to others. In my view, these are binding authorities to show that the preliminary question, namely, whether there was any right of the plaintiffs to pursue their calling unmolested, must be answered in the affirmative. The H question what is the right invaded would seem to be reasonably answered, and the universality of the right to all Her Majesty's subjects seems to me to be no argument against its existence. It is, indeed, part of that freedom from restraint, that liberty of action which, in my view, may be found to be running through the principles of our law.

I will deal separately both with the remedy for the infringement of that right, I if it has been infringed, and with the means by which it is alleged to have been infringed. Upon this part of the case I wish to quote and make my own the language of BRAMWELL, B., in R. v. Drutt (1) (10 Cox, C.C. at p. 600):

"When the law gave, or rather acknowledged, a right, it provided a punishment or a remedy for the violation of that right. That was a cardinal rule and an obvious one. The old expression that 'there was no wrong without a remedy' might also be interpreted to mean that there was also no right without a remedy. Sometimes the remedy was by a criminal proceeding, sometimes by a

A civil action, sometimes by both. Having made those general remarks he would make another, which was also familiar to all Englishmen, namely, that there was no right in this country under our laws so sacred as the right of personal liberty. No right of property or capital, about which there had been so much declamation, was so sacred or so carefully guarded by the law of this land as that of personal liberty. They were quite aware of the pains taken by the common law, by the writ, as it was called, of habeas corpus, and supplemented by statute, to secure to every man his personal freedom—that he should not be put in prison without lawful cause, and that if he was, he should be brought before a competent magistrate within a given time, and be set at liberty or undergo punishment. But that liberty was not liberty of the body only. It was also a liberty of the mind and will; and the liberty of a man's mind and will, to say how he should bestow himself and his means, his talents and his industry, was as much a subject of the law's protection as was that of his body. Generally speaking, the way in which people had endeavoured to control the operation of the minds of men was by putting restraints on their bodies, and therefore we had not so many instances in which the liberty of the mind was vindicated as was that of the body. Still, if any set of men agreed among themselves to coerce that liberty of mind and thought by compulsion and restraint, they would be guilty of a criminal offence, namely, that of conspiring against the liberty of mind and freedom of will of those towards whom they so conducted themselves. He was referring to coercion or compulsion—something that was unpleasant and annoying to the mind operated upon, and he laid it down as clear and undoubted law that, if two or more persons agreed that they would by such means co-operate together against that liberty, they would be guilty of an indictable offence."

It is said, indeed, that an action for the infringement of such a right is a novelty; but I do not concur that it is, or that if it were it would be a sufficient argument. The whole history of the action upon the case affirms the principle that where cases fall under the same right and require a like remedy new precedents should be created. So, in Pasley v. Freeman (2), per ASHURST, J. (3 Term Rep. at p. 63):

"Another argument which has been made use of is, that this is a new case, and that there is no precedent for such an action. Where cases are new in their principle, there I admit that it is necessary to have recourse to legislative interposition in order to remedy the grievance; but where the case is only new in the instance, and the only question is upon the application of a principle recognised in the law of such new case, it will be just as competent to courts of justice to apply the principle in any case that may arise two centuries hence as it was two centuries ago. If it were not so, we ought to blot out of our law books one-fourth part of the cases that are to be found in them."

It is said that the company were acting within their legal rights in discharging the plaintiffs.

So they were, but does that affect the question of the responsibility of the person who caused them so to act by the means he used? The question must be whether what was done in fact, and what did in fact procure the dismissal of the plaintiff, was an actionable wrong or not. I have never heard that a man who was dismissed from his service by reason of some slander could not maintain an action against the slanderer because the master had a legal right to discharge him. In treating this question I can desire no more apt exposition of the law than what is contained in BOWEN, L.J.'s admirably reasoned judgment in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (3) in the Court of Appeal (23 Q.B.D. at p. 614): •

away of customers by show of violence (Tarleton v. M'Gawley (4)); the obstruction of actors on the stage by preconcerted hissing (Clifford v. Brandon (5); Gregory v. Duke of Brunswick (6)); the disturbance of wildfowl in decoys by the firing of guns (Carrington v. Taylor (7); and Keeble v. Hickeringill (8)); the impeding or threatening servant or workmen (Garret v. Taylor (9)); the inducing persons under personal contracts to break their contracts (Bowen v. Hall (10); Lumley v. Gye (11)), are all instances of such forbidden acts."

It will be observed that, in what BOWEN, L.J., says, intimidation, obstruction, or molestation, or intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other (always assuming that there is no just cause for it), are each of them, where damage has been caused, actionable wrongs. And so SIR WILLIAM ERLE, in a passage from his treatise, published in 1869, on the law relating to trade unions, quoted by LORD ESHER, M.R., points out:

"Every person has a right under the law, as between him and his fellow-subjects, to full freedom in disposing of his own labour or his own capital according to his own will. It follows that every other person is subject to the co-relative duty arising therefrom, and is prohibited from any obstruction to the fullest exercise of this right which can be made compatible with the exercise of similar rights by others. Every act causing an obstruction to another in the exercise of the right comprised within this description, done, not in the exercise of the actors's own right, but for the purpose of obstruction, would, if damage should be caused thereby to the party obstructed, be a violation of this prohibition, and the violation of this prohibition by a single person is a wrong, to be remedied either by action or indictment, as the case may be."

BOWEN, L.J., was too keen a reasoner not to observe that the words "without just cause or excuse," which he had used, required exposition to render his reasoning complete, and accordingly he explains in another part of his judgment what his view was of malice. His Lordship thus describes the state of mind which in his view would negative just cause or excuse, Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (3) (23 Q.B.D. at p. 613):

"Now, intentionally to do that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage, and which does, in fact, damage another in that other person's property or trade, is actionable if done without just cause or excuse. Such intentional action when done without just cause or excuse is what the law calls a malicious wrong: see Bromage v. Prosser (12); Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty (13), per LORD BLACKBURN (7 App. Cas. at p. 772)."

I must for my own part disclaim the idea that you can get rid of observations such as these in the learned judge's judgment by saying that they are obiter. It will be observed that BOWEN, L.J., points out that not only contractual rights are comprehended within his view, but other rights, such as the right to carry on the business of an actor and the like.

In the same case, on appeal to this House, it appears to me that the principle upon which that decision was arrived at is an important one as excluding what is here suggested to be lawful. I myself asked in that case ([1892] A.C. at p. 38):

"What legal right is interfered with? What coercion of the mind or will of the person is affected? All are free to trade upon what terms they will, and nothing has been done, except in rival trading, which can be supposed to interfere with the appellants' interests."

LORD WATSON pointed out that the withdrawal of agency at first appeared to him to be a matter attended with difficulty, but that on consideration he was satisfied that it could not be regarded as an illegal act. He said (ibid. at p. 43):

A "In the first place, it was impossible that any honest man could impartially discharge his duty of finding freights to parties who occupied the hostile position of the appellants and respondents, and, in the second place, the respondents gave the agents the option of continuing to act for one or other of them in circumstances which placed the appellants at no disadvantage."

B He added that it had not been proved and not been suggested that the respondents used either misrepresentation or compulsion for the purpose of obtaining the object of their combination. LORD BRAMWELL begins his judgment by saying (ibid. at p. 44) that the plaintiffs in that case

C "did not complain of any trespass, violence, fraud, or breach of contract, nor of any direct tort or violation of any right of the plaintiffs, like the case of firing to frighten birds from a decoy; nor of any act, the ultimate object of which was to injure the plaintiffs, having its origin in malice or ill-will to them."

D LORD MORRIS expressed his intention to adopt entirely the principles laid down by BOWEN, L.J., and LORD MACNAGHTEN adopted LORD BRAMWELL's opinion. LORD FIELD justifies his opinion, which he says may be supported upon the principles laid down in Keeble v. Hickeringill (8) as to which I shall have a word to say hereafter. But he goes on to say ([1892] A.C. at pp. 56, 57) that

E "everything that was done by the respondents was done in the exercise of their right to carry on their own trade, and was bonâ fide so done. There was not only no malice or indirect object in fact, but the existence of the right to exercise a lawful employment, in the pursuance of which the respondents acted, negatives the presumption of malice which arises when the purposed infliction of loss and injury upon another cannot be attributed to any legitimate cause, and is therefore presumably due to nothing but its obvious object of harm."

F LORD HANNEN says (ibid. at p. 59) that he considered "that a different case would have arisen if the evidence had shown that the object of the defendants was a malicious one—namely, to injure the plaintiff, whether they, the defendants, should be benefited or not."

G He concludes his opinion by saying that it appears to him "that in that case there was nothing indicating an intention to injure the plaintiffs, except in so far as such injury would be the result of the defendants obtaining for themselves the benefits of the carrying trade, by giving better terms to customers, than their rivals, the plaintiffs, were willing to offer." I have been careful to call attention to the opinions of the noble and learned Lords, not only because I think that a use has been made of the decision in that case which is not justified by anything in the opinions delivered; but rather because I think that upon the principles I have indicated, if the elements which each noble Lord in turn pointed out did not exist in that case had in fact existed, the decision would have been the other way.

I do not think that Keeble v. Hickeringill (8) stands alone, though, if it did, considering who decided it, and that certainly in later years it has been much quoted and commented on, and never, until now, so far as I am aware, criticised or questioned, I should be quite content to rely upon the authority of so profound a lawyer as LORD HOLT, and such an expositor as he was of the spirit of freedom which runs through the English law, but it will be also observed that in this House, LORDS BRAMWELL and FIELD, and in the Court of Appeal BOWEN, L.J., assume it to be good law. It is interesting to observe that that case has been recognised and acted upon in the American courts, where these questions of capital and labour have not infrequently arisen. In Walker v. Cronin (14) it was held that an action of tort would lie upon a count alleging that the plaintiff was a manufacturer of shoes, and for the prosecution of his business it was necessary for him to employ many shoemakers; that the defendant, well knowing this, did unlawfully, A and without justifiable cause, molest him in carrying on the said business with the unlawful purpose of preventing him from carrying it on, and wilfully induced many shoemakers who were in his employment, and others who were about to enter into it, to abandon it without his consent and against his will, and that thereby he lost their services and the profits, etc., to be derived therefrom, and was B put to expense, etc. The second count alleges contracts between the plaintiff and the shoemakers to make stock into shoes, and that the defendant "well knowing this, with the unlawful purpose of preventing him (the plaintiff) from carrying on his business, induced them to return the stock unfinished to the factory, and to neglect and refuse to make it into shoes as they had agreed to do." The third count alleges the defendant enticed and procured a shoemaker in the plaintiffs' C service and employment who had agreed to make three cases of shoes to leave the plaintiff's service and employment. There was a demurrer to the declaration, and this demurrer was allowed in the Superior Court, whereupon the plaintiff appealed. WELLS, J., after citing Com. Dig., Action on the Case, A.,

"in all cases where a man has a temporal loss or damage by the wrong of D another, he may have an action on the case to be repaired in damages," goes on to review in order Keeble v. Hickeringill (8); Tarleton v. M'Gawley (4);

Green v. Button (15); Gunter v. Astor (16); Hart v. Aldridge (17); Shepherd v.
Wakeman (18); Winsmore v. Greenback (19); and Lumley v. Gye (11). He overruled the demurrer, and, holding that the declaration sufficiently alleged (i) intentional and wilful acts; (ii) calculated to cause damage to the plaintiff in his lawful E business; (iii) done with the unlawful purpose to cause such damage and loss without right or justifiable cause on the part of the defendant (which constitutes malice); and (iv) actual damage and loss resulting, held that each of the three counts disclosed a good cause of action. He continued: "This decision does not apply to a case of interference by way of friendly advice honestly given, nor is it in denial of the right to free expression of opinion. We have no occasion now to F consider what would constitute justifiable cause."

Benton v. Pratt (20) and Rice v. Manley (21) were both cases where the defendant through false words caused a third person who had entered into contracts of sale (in the first-named case of cheese, in the second of hogs) void by the Statute of Frauds, to break such contracts. An action was held to lie in each case. In Bixby v. Dunlap (22) it was held that exemplary damages could be recovered from G a defendant who knowingly procured a servant to leave a master whom she had contracted to serve without ever being actually in his employment. Lumley v.
Gye (11) is here taken as having laid down the law on this subject. In Angle
v. Chicago, etc., Rail. Co. (23) it was alleged that the United States had granted lands in the State of Wisconsin in aid of the construction of railways. The State of Wisconsin had granted a portion of these lands to the defendant company for H the purpose of constructing a particular railway. It had also granted other lands to another company—the Portage Co.—to construct another and somewhat competing railway. This latter railway was to be completed within a certain time.
This could not be done, and the State of Wisconsin enlarged the time for completion. The Portage Co. then employed the plaintiff to complete the line, and he was actively prosecuting the work when the defendant company, conspiring with I certain officials of the Portage Co., induced the State of Wisconsin to revoke the concession to the Portage Co., whereby the plaintiff lost his employment. He, accordingly, brought his action. The court held, following Lumley v. Gye (11) and Bowen v. Hall (10), that the defendant company were liable to the plaintiff.

I now revert to that part of the case which I admit has to be carefully considered —whether in what the defendant did in order to procure the dismissal of the plaintiffs he came within any of the rules which have been laid down in the cases quoted. To my mind, he was guilty of intimidation and coercion by that intima-

A tion—though in using that phrase, “of intimidation,” I am not using it in the technical sense which the statutes upon the subject have been construed to mean. I will explain in what sense I do understand the words, but in passing I must deprecate the language which has been used to minimise the effect of what Allen said. I observe it is described as “inconvenience.” That is not how it is described by the witness. Edmonds, the foreman of the Glengall Co., thus described what B would have been the effect upon the business of the firm. He said :

C “They were rather busy just then with boilermakers; that they employed three times as many boilermakers as shipwrights; and if the boilermakers had knocked off work or struck, it would have stopped the business of the company altogether—entirely—at that time, and that it was a very serious matter to the firm, and that the discharge of the men was in order to prevent their having to stop the business.”

D It seems to me very obvious to ask whether the threat to do that which would have such an effect as the witness described is a coercion of the will or not. The men were good workmen and of good character; they were working, even according to Allen’s own view, at their own trade as shipwrights, but they had worked upon a former occasion for a different employer upon an iron ship. I think that the dissatisfaction among the boilermakers at these two men being employed has been greatly exaggerated.

It is important to call attention to the exact question which was left to the jury. KENNEDY, J., said :

E “The question that I want you to answer is that, if you find he [the defendant] induced the Glengall Iron Co. by the threat which is suggested by the plaintiffs of calling out all the men on strike and that he continued in that course of conduct if there was any attempt to employ them again, did he do that with the malicious intention which I have endeavoured to explain—that is merely, not for the purpose of forwarding that which he believed to be his interest as a delegate of his union in the fair consideration of that interest, but for the purpose of injuring these plaintiffs and preventing them doing that which they were each of them entitled to do.”

G It appears to me that that is a direction of which the defendant cannot complain, since it puts what is, to my mind, an alternative more favourable to him. In my view, his belief that what he was doing was for his interest as a delegate of his union would not justify the doing of what he did do. It is alleged, and, to my mind and to the mind of the jury, proved, that the employers were compelled, under pressure of the threats that he used, to discharge the plaintiffs. I have not used the word “intimidated,” because I observe the learned judge says there was no intimidation in a legal sense. If what was meant by that was that there was H no threat of violence to person or property, it is true, but the word “intimidation” is not always to be construed as it has been construed under the Combinations of Workmen Act, 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 129). The construction of it in that statute flowed from the other words with which the word “intimidate” is associated; and if, instead of the word “intimidate,” that which was held out as the inducement to dismiss the plaintiffs was that such a stoppage of the works should be occasioned I as that the business of the company would seriously suffer, I should think that would be a thing which would be likely to produce fear of the consequences of the company retaining them in their employment, and a company which abstained from doing so by reason of that fear would justly be described as intimidated.

The objection made by the defendant appears to be that the word “malicious” adds nothing; that if the thing was lawful it was lawful absolutely; if it was not lawful it was unlawful—the addition of the word “malicious” can make no difference. The fallacy appears to me to reside in the assumption that everything must be absolutely lawful or absolutely unlawful. There are many things which may become lawful or unlawful according to circumstances. In a decision of this House (Bradford Corpn. v. Pickles (24) ) it has undoubtedly been held that, whatever a man's motives may be, he may dig into his own land and divert subterranean water which, but for his so treating his own land, might have reached his neighbour's land. But that is because the neighbour had no right to the flow of the subterranean water in that direction, and he had an absolute right to do what he would with his own property. But what analogy has such a case with the intentional infliction of injury upon another person's property, reputation, or lawful occupation? To dig into one's own land under the circumstances stated requires no cause or excuse. He may act from mere caprice, but his right on his own land is absolute, so long as he does not interfere with the rights of others. But, referring to BOWEN, L.J.'s, observation, which, to my mind, is exactly accurate,

"in order to justify the intentional doing of that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage, and which does in fact damage, another in that person's property or trade," you must have some just cause or excuse.

The word "malicious" appears to me to negative just cause or excuse, and, without attempting an exhaustive exposition of the word itself, it appears to me that, if I apply the language of BOWEN, L.J., it is enough to show that this was within the meaning of the law "malicious." If the representative of the men had in good faith and without indirect motive pointed out the inconvenience that might result from having two sets of men working together on the same ship, whose views upon the particular question were so diverse that it would be inexpedient to bring them together, no one could have complained; but if his object was to punish the men belonging to another union because on some former occasion they had worked on an iron ship, it seems to me that the difference of motive may make the whole difference between the lawfulness or unlawfulness of that which he did. I see that it is suggested by one of your Lordships that the action for malicious prosecution is supposed to be an exception. I am not quite certain that I understand what is the proposition to which it is an exception. If it means that there is no other form of procedure known to the law wherein malice may make the distinction between a lawful and an unlawful act, I am unable to agree. Maliciously procuring a person to be made a bankrupt, maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause presenting a petition to wind-up a company, or maliciously procuring an arrest, are equally cases wherein the state of mind of the person procuring the act may affect the question of the lawfulness or unlawfulness of the act done. Again, in slander or libel the right to preserve one's character or business from attack appears to me quite as vague and general a right as it is suggested is the right to pursue one's occupation unmolested; and it cannot be denied that in both these cases the lawfulness or unlawfulness of what is said or written may depend upon the absence or presence of malice. Doubtless, there are cases in which the mere presence of malice in an act done will not necessarily give a right of action, since no damage may result; and in this case, however malicious Allen's intervention may have been, if the employers had defied Allen's threats, instead of yielding to them, the plaintiffs could not have succeeded in an action, because they would not have been injured: see Quartz Hill Gold Mining Co. v. Eyre (25); Gibbs v. Pike (26); Jenings v. Florence (27). On the same principle an action will not lie against a sheriff for a false return to a writ of execution if the plaintiff has not suffered actual damage in consequence of the false return: see Wylie v. Birch (28).

I turn now to the course of the trial, which is important in more ways than one. It is manifest that both the form of the statement of claim and the evidence directed at the trial were intended to raise the question of the right of the Boiler-makers' Union to use what I will call their union for combined action against the individual plaintiffs who belonged to another union. The plaintiffs apparently proceeded upon the assumption that what was represented to them as having been said by Allen was said in his character of delegate of and speaking with the authority of the Boilermakers' Union, and, accordingly, the general secretary of this trades union and the chairman at the time of these transactions were both joined as defendants. Had they adopted or had been proved to authorise the course taken by Allen, a question would have arisen whether or not they were all three parties to a conspiracy. Whether that charge could have been maintained against them or not, I at present desire to say nothing. Such a question may arise again, and I wish to keep myself free to consider that question when it arises. But the chairman and the secretary of the union absolutely disclaimed any general or specific authority on the part of Allen either to threaten the employers or to withdraw the men. As to specific authority the chairman proved that he had never heard of the dispute until he was served with the writ in the action. He says in terms that he never gave any authority to Allen to threaten employers to withdraw men from the work, and to do any such thing he regarded as a very serious matter for any delegate to take upon himself, and, so far was he from adopting what Allen is sworn to have said, namely, that the union would hunt the two men out of every employment where they are known to be because they had once worked on an iron ship, he emphatically denies the right of his union to do anything of the sort. He says, in terms, "providing that the shipwright after being at the iron work started in some other place, for instance, then I would say we have no right whatever to interfere with him unless he were then beginning iron work again. If he started at woodwork we would not interfere with him in any other place." The learned counsel then puts a question to him (I think somewhat under a misapprehension as to what the judge meant by a question which he put), "You say that may depend on circumstances?" And his answer is: "I do not say they would in that instance, because in no instance have I ever known men interfering with him when he went to some other works and started his own particular work."

I think it only just to the Boilermakers' Union to point out how emphatically and distinctly their authorised officers (chairman and general secretary) disclaimed any such practice or principle as that which Allen is sworn to have attributed to them, and accordingly no imputation or liability could properly be attributed to the Boilermakers' Union or their authorised officers; but does that relieve Allen from the consequences of what he did? If concerted collective action to enforce, by ruining the men's employment, the will of a large number of men upon a minority, whether the minority consists of a small or of a large number, be a cause of action where the actual damage is produced, it would seem to be a very singular result that the action of an individual who falsely assumes the character of representing a large body, uses the name of that large body to give force and support to the threat which he utters, and so produces the injury to the individual, or to the minority, could shield himself from responsibility by proving that the body whose power and influence he had falsely invoked as his supporters had given him no authority for his threats, so that, if they in truth authorised him, he and they might all have been responsible, while the false statement that he made, though acting upon the employer by the same pressure because it was believed and producing the same mischief to the person against whom it was directed, could establish no cause of action against himself because it was false.

I now come to the question raised upon the pleadings that the falsehood of Allen's allegations is not set out. I venture to think that this objection is founded upon an erroneous assumption that the action must be brought for false representations, and that accordingly the false representations must be set out in the statement of claim. I think this is an erroneous assumption, and that the action is what it is—that the defendant maliciously and wrongfully and with intent to injure the plaintiffs intimidated and coerced the Glengall Iron Co. not to enter into contracts with the plaintiffs, whereby the plaintiffs have suffered damage. The objection may be treated as one of form or as one of substance. Treating it as one of form only,

I do not think that it ever was necessary in the pleadings where an unlawful procuring something to be done was the cause of action, to set out the means by which that something was procured. WILLES, C.J., in Winsmore v. Greenbank (19) said:

“to set forth all the facts to show how a thing which is charged to be unlawfully done has been done; that would make the pleadings intolerable, and would increase the length and expense unnecessarily, and even in an indictment for conspiracy it is not necessary to state the means employed.”

See R. v. Sterling (29); R. v. Kinnersley and Moore (30); see also Sydserff v. R. (31). So also upon an indictment under the Incitement to Mutiny Act, 1797, the preamble of which states:

“Whereas divers wicked and evil-disposed persons, by the publication of written or printed papers, and by malicious and advised speaking, have of late industriously endeavoured to seduce persons serving in His Majesty’s forces by sea and land from their duty and allegiance to His Majesty, and to incite then to mutiny and disobedience, Be it enacted that . . . any person who shall maliciously and advisedly endeavour to seduce any person or persons serving in His Majesty’s forces, by sea or land, from his or their duty and allegiance to His Majesty, or to incite or stir up any such person or persons to commit an act of mutiny . . . should be guilty of felony.”

It was held that it was unnecessary in the indictment to do more than charge the defendants with having endeavoured to seduce persons from their allegiance without setting forth any of the words or writings by which that endeavour was made: R. v. Fuller (32).

If, treating it as matter of substance, the objection would be that without giving notice to the defendant and without any such specified objection being submitted to the jury, it was being imputed to him that he had said what was false, it is almost impossible to suggest that here there could be any such objection to substance. What he said and did by way of inducement, threat or coercion, was in truth the whole question in the case. He gave evidence denying what was imputed to him, and so far from setting up the right on behalf of his union to exercise their right of withdrawing their men if the demand for the discharge of the two plaintiffs were not complied with, he absolutely denied that he had ever done so; and the proper authorities of his union, as I have pointed out already, negatived any authority to make such representations as the other witnesses proved that he did make, or that they had been parties or would consent to be parties to the most offensive of his threats, namely the hunting down of the two shipwrights because they had once worked upon iron ships. This question was before the jury, and the jury could not have answered the question as they did if they had not disbelieved Allen’s statement. It seems to me, therefore, that neither in substance nor in form can any objection be made to the topic (for it is but the topic and not the substance of the cause of action) that he was guilty of false representations as fortifying the threats that he was making. It can scarcely be contended that because he had not that authority behind him which he represented, because he was not truly representing either the wishes or the commands of his union, that could furnish him with any excuse. As well might it be contended that the highwayman was not responsible for the coercion he exercised towards his victim if he put a pistol to his head, because it should afterwards turn out that the pistol was unloaded.

I regret that I am compelled to differ so widely with some of your Lordships, but my difference is founded on the belief that in denying these plaintiffs a remedy we are departing from the principles which have hitherto guided our courts in the preservation of individual liberty to all. I am encouraged, however, by the consideration that the adverse views appear to me to overrule the views of most distinguished judges, going back now for certainly 200 years, and that up to the period when this case reached your Lordships' House, there was an unanimous consensus of opinion, and that of eight judges who have given us the benefit of their opinions, six have concurred in the judgments which your Lordships are now asked to overrule.

LORD WATSON.—This appeal in which the litigants are members of two rival associations of working men, registered under the Trade Unions Act, 1871, raises some important questions, upon which there appears to be room for considerable difference of opinion. The appellant contends that judgment ought to be entered in his favour, inasmuch as the findings of the jury, when rightly interpreted, do not disclose any cause of action against him, and, alternatively, that, these findings being against the weight of evidence, the case ought to be sent back for new trial.

I have not found it necessary to consider the second of these propositions, having arrived at the conclusion that the first of them is well-founded. The substance of the verdict may be resolved into three findings: first, that the Glengall Iron Co. discharged the respondents from their employment, and did not re-engage them; secondly, that the company were induced to do so by the appellant; and, thirdly, that the appellant maliciously induced the action of the company. There is no expression in the verdict which can be held, either directly or by implication, to impeach the legality of the company's conduct in discharging the respondents. The mere fact of an employer discharging or refusing to engage a workman, does not imply or even suggest the absence of his legal right to do either, as he may choose. It is true that the company is not a party to this suit; but it is also obvious that the character of the act induced, whether legal or illegal, may have a bearing upon the liability in law of the person who procured it. The whole pith of the verdict, in so far as it directly concerns the appellant, is contained in the word "maliciously," a word which is susceptible of many different meanings. The expression "maliciously induce," as it occurs upon the face of the verdict, is ambiguous; it is capable of signifying that the appellant knowingly induced an act which of itself constituted a civil wrong, or it may simply mean that the appellant procured, with intent to injure the respondents, an act which, apart from motive, would not have amounted to a civil wrong, and it is, in my opinion, material to ascertain in which of these senses it was used by the jury.

Although the rule may be otherwise with regard to crimes, the law of England does not, according to my apprehension, take into account motive as constituting an element of civil wrong. Any invasion of the civil rights of another person is in itself a legal wrong, carrying with it liability to repair its necessary and natural consequences, in so far as these are injurious to the person whose right is infringed, whether the motive which prompted it be good, bad, or indifferent. But the existence of a bad motive, in the case of an act which is not in itself illegal, will not convert that act into a civil wrong, for which reparation is due. A wrongful act, done knowingly, and with a view to its injurious consequences, may, in the sense of law, be malicious; but such malice derives its essential character from the circumstance that the act done constitutes a violation of the law. There is a class of cases which have sometimes been referred to as evidencing that a bad motive may be an element in the composition of civil wrong; but in these cases the wrong must have its root in an act which the law generally regards as illegal, but excuses its perpetration in certain exceptional circumstances, from considerations of public policy. These are well known as cases of privilege, in which the protection which the law gives to an individual who is within the scope of these considerations consists in this, that he may with immunity commit an act which is a legal wrong, and but for his privilege would afford a good cause of action against him; all that is required in order to raise the privilege and entitle him to protection being that he shall act honestly in the discharge of some duty which the law recognises, and shall not be prompted by a desire to injure the person who is affected by his act. Accordingly, in a suit brought by that person, it is necessary A for him to prove an intent to injure in order to destroy the privilege of the defendant.

But none of these cases tends to establish that an act which does not amount to a legal wrong, and, therefore, needs no protection, can have privilege attached to it, and still less that an act in itself lawful is converted into a legal wrong if it was done from a bad motive. BOWEN, L.J., in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (3), laid it down that, in order to constitute legal malice, the act done must, B apart from bad motive, amount to a violation of law. The learned judge, with his accustomed accuracy and felicity, said (23 Q.B.D. at p. 612):

“We were invited by the plaintiffs’ counsel to accept the position from which their argument started, that an action will lie if a man maliciously and wrongfully conducts himself so as to injure another in that other’s trade. Obscurity C resides in the language used to state this proposition. The terms ‘maliciously,’ ‘wrongfully,’ and ‘injure,’ are words which have accurate meanings well known to the law, but also have a popular and less precise signification, into which it is necessary to see that the argument does not imperceptibly slide. An intent to ‘injure’ in strictness means more than an intent to harm. It connotes an attempt to do wrongful harm. ‘Maliciously,’ in like manner, means and D implies an intention to do an act which is wrongful to the detriment of another. The term ‘wrongful’ imports in its terms the infringement of some right.”

The words which I have quoted are in substantial agreement with the language used by BAYLEY, J., in Bromage v. Prosser (12), to the effect that.

“malice in common acceptation means ill-will against a person, but in its legal sense it means a wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse.” E

According to the learned judge, in order to constitute legal malice, the act done must be wrongful, which plainly means an illegal act subjecting the doer to responsibility for its consequences, and the intentional doing of that wrongful act F will make it a malicious wrong in the sense of law. While it is true that no act in itself lawful requires an excuse, it is equally true that some acts in themselves illegal admit of a legal excuse, and it is to these that BAYLEY, J., obviously refers.
The root of the principle is that, in any legal question, malice depends not upon evil motive which influenced the mind of the actor, but upon the illegal character of the act which he contemplated and committed. In my opinion, it is alike G consistent with reason and common sense that when the act done is, apart from the feelings which prompted it, legal, the civil law ought to take no cognisance of its motive.

It does not appear to me to admit of doubt that the jury, in finding the action of the company to have been maliciously induced by the appellant, simply meant to affirm that the appellant was influenced by a bad motive, namely, an intention H to injure the respondents in their trade or calling of shipwrights. At the trial the case for the plaintiffs was conducted, and was submitted to the jury by the learned judge who presided, upon the lines laid down by LORD ESHER, M.R., and LOPES and A. L. SMITH, L.JJ., in Temperton v. Russell (33). When the present case was before the Court of Appeal the same doctrine was repeated by the Master of the Rolls and LOPES, L.J., and was expounded at great length by LORD ESHER. I RIGBY, L.J., deferred to, but did not express his concurrence in, the authority of Temperton v. Russell (33), which he accepted as binding upon him. In that state of the law as expounded in the Court of Appeal, it is not surprising to find that KENNEDY, J., while he did not suggest to the jury that the action of the appellant, apart from its motive, constituted a legal wrong, directed them to consider whether the appellant acted “maliciously,” and explained that by that word he meant “with the intention and for the purpose of doing an injury” to the plaintiffs in their business. I do not dispute that the law laid down in this case by the

A presiding judge, and upheld by the Court of Appeal, would justify the verdict of the jury. It simply comes to this, that, to induce another person to commit an act which is within his legal right, does not in itself afford a cause of action, but that the person who procured his action is guilty of a legal wrong if he was actuated by an intent to injure, and is liable in reparation to those against whom his evil intent was directed. The doctrine clearly runs through LORD ESHER's judgment. Whether mere "persuasion" or mere "advice" entails liability on the person using them appears to me to be a speculation which it would be unprofitable to discuss, and I shall, therefore, assume that the words refer to the means used by a person who, in the sense of law, "procures" the act of another.

A breach of contract is in itself a legal wrong; and in Lumley v. Gye (11) it was said by ERLE, J. (2 E. & B. at p. 232):

"It is clear that the procurement of the violation of a right is a cause of action in all cases where the violation is an actionable wrong."

In the same case it was held by the majority of the learned judges that the defendant was liable in damages, upon the express ground that, in knowingly procuring an illegal act, he had committed a wrong which the law regards as malicious. They regarded malice as signifying in law, not that the defendant had been actuated by a bad motive, but that he had procured the commission of an act which he knew to be illegal. There are, in my opinion, two grounds only upon which a person who procures the act of another can be made legally responsible for its consequences. In the first place, he will incur liability if he knowingly, and for his own ends, induces that other person to commit an actionable wrong. In the second place, when the act induced is within the right of the immediate actor, and is, therefore, not wrongful in so far as he is concerned, it may yet be to the detriment of a third party, and, in that case, according to the law laid down by the majority in Lumley v. Gye (11), the inducer may be held liable if he can be shown to have procured his object by the use of illegal means directed against that third party.

The question submitted by the House, for the opinion of the learned judges who have favoured us with their assistance, was: "Assuming the evidence given by the plaintiffs' witnesses to be correct, was there any evidence of a cause of action fit to be left to the jury?" The terms in which the query is framed afford an opportunity, of which some of the learned judges have not been slow to avail themselves, of referring to the evidence of the respondents' witnesses in quest of some fact which might impart a legal and not a conventional meaning as to malice as found by the jury. But, according to my apprehension, it was not intended, nor would it be legitimate, in pursuing that investigation, to disregard the pleadings of the respondents, or the course which was followed by their counsel, at the trial of the cause. To deal with the case on any other terms would be to start issues which the respondents themselves never raised until they came to the Bar of this House, and to apply to these issues evidence which was directed, not to these, but to other points. I, therefore, find it necessary to express an opinion upon various questions which were canvassed in the course of the argument addressed to us.

First of all, although the statement of claim set forth that the appellant induced the Glengall Iron Co. to "break and refuse to perform their contract" with the respondents, the allegation is not borne out by their own evidence. Assuming that the Glengall Iron Co., in dispensing with the further services of the respondents, were guilty of no wrong, I am willing to take it that any person who procured their act might incur responsibility to those who were injuriously affected by it, if he employed unlawful means of inducement, directed against them. According to the decision of the majority in Lumley v. Gye (11), already referred to, a person who, by illegal means, that is, means which in themselves are in the nature of civil wrongs, produces the lawful act of another, which act is calculated to injure, and does injure, a third party, commits a wrong for which he may be made answerable. A

So long as the word "means" is understood in its natural proper sense, that rule appears to me to be intelligible; but I am altogether unable to appreciate the loose logic which confounds internal feelings with outward acts, and treats the motive of the actor as one of the means employed by him.

It has been maintained, and some of the learned judges who lent their assistance to the House have favoured the argument, that the appellant used coercion as a B means of compelling the Glengall Iron Co. to terminate their connection with the respondents, but that conclusion does not appear to me to be the fair result of the evidence. If coercion, in the only legal sense of the term, was employed, it was a wrong done as much to the Glengall Iron Co., who are the parties said to have been coerced, as to the respondents. Its result might be prejudicial to the respondents, but its efficacy wholly depended upon its being directed against and C operating upon the company. It must be kept in view that the question what amounts to wrongful coercion in a legal sense involves the same considerations which I have discussed in relation to the elements of a civil wrong, as committed by the immediate actor. According to my opinion, coercion, whatever be its nature, must, in order to infer the legal liability of the person who employs it, be D intrinsically, and irrespectively of its motive, a wrongful act. According to the doctrine ventilated in Temperton v. Russell (33) and the present case, it need not amount to a wrong, but will become wrongful if it was prompted by a bad motive. It is, in my opinion, the absolute right of every workman to exercise his own option with regard to the persons in whose society he will agree or continue E to work. It may be deplorable that feelings of rivalry between different associations of working men should ever run so high as to make members of one union seriously object to continue their labour in company with members of another trade union; but so long as they commit no legal wrong, and use no means which are illegal, they are at perfect liberty to act upon their own views. That the boilermakers who were employed at the Regent Dockyard, Millwall, did seriously resent the presence among them of the respondents, very plainly appears from the evidence F of the respondents themselves, and that they would certainly have left the dock had the respondents continued to be employed appears to me to be an undoubted fact in the case. They were not under any continuing engagement to their employers, and, if they had left their work and gone out on strike, they would have been acting within their right, whatever might be thought of the propriety of the proceeding. Not only so, but they were, in my opinion, entitled to inform G the Glengall Iron Co. of the step which they contemplated, as well as of the reasons by which they were influenced, and that either by their own mouth, or, as they preferred, by the appellant as their representative. If the workmen had made the communication themselves, and had been influenced by bad motives towards the respondents, then, according to the law which has been generally accepted by the courts below, they would each and all of them have incurred H responsibility to the respondents. But it was clearly for the benefit of the employers that they should know what would be the result of their retaining in their service men to whom the majority of their workmen objected; and the giving of such information did not, in my opinion, amount to coercion of the employers, who were in no proper sense coerced, but merely followed the course which they thought would be most conducive to their own interests. I

I think it right to observe that, if the evidence had, in my opinion, contained statements sufficient to support a charge of coercion, I should have declined in the circumstances of the present case to give effect to it. I entertain little doubt as to the incompetency, but none as to the inexpediency of this House entertaining and deciding an issue of fact which, if not formally abandoned, was not brought forward at the trial or submitted to the jury, and that upon evidence which was not directed to it, for the purpose of patching up a verdict which is impeached in point of law.

A The doctrine laid down by the Court of Appeal in this case and in Temperton v. Russell (33), with regard to the efficacy of evil motives in making—to use the words of LORD ESHER—“that unlawful which would otherwise be lawful,” is stated in wide and comprehensive terms; but the majority of the consulted judges who approve of the doctrine have only dealt with it as applying to cases of interference with a man’s trade or employment. Even in that more limited application, it would lead, in some cases, to singular results. One who committed an act not in itself illegal, but attended with consequences detrimental to several other persons, would incur liability to those of them whom it was proved that he intended to injure, and the rest of them would have no remedy. A master who dismissed a servant engaged from day to day, or whose contract of service had expired, and declined to give him further employment because he disliked the man, and desired to punish him, would be liable in an action for tort. And ex pari ratione, a servant would be liable in damages to a master whom he disliked, if he left his situation at the expiry of his engagement and declined to be re-engaged, in the knowledge and with the intent that the master would be put to considerable inconvenience, expense, and loss before he could provide a substitute.

D If that be the state of the law it is somewhat remarkable that there is no case to be found in the books of any such action having been sustained. The authority which is mainly relied on as supporting the doctrine of the recent case is Keeble v. Hickeringill (8), which was decided by the Court of Queen’s Bench about two centuries ago. I am very far from suggesting that the antiquity of a decision furnishes a good objection to its weight; but it is a circumstance which certainly invites and requires careful consideration, unless the decision is directly in point and its principle has since been recognised and acted upon. In Keeble v. Hickeringill (8) the plaintiff sued for the disturbance of a decoy upon his property, which he used for the purpose of capturing wild fowl and sending them to market. The defendant, who was an adjoining proprietor, had fired guns upon his own land, not with the view of killing game or wildfowl, but with the sole object of frightening the birds, and either driving them out of his neighbour’s decoy pond or preventing them from entering it. The act complained of was, in substance, the making of a noise so close to the lands of the plaintiff as to be a nuisance to him. Upon that aspect of the case I do not find it necessary to express any opinion as to the conduct of the defendant; but this much is clear, that no proprietor has an absolute right to create noises upon his own land, because any right which the law gives him is qualified by the condition that it must not be exercised to the nuisance of his neighbours or of the public. If he violates that condition he commits a legal wrong, and, if he does so intentionally, he is guilty of a malicious wrong, in its strict legal sense.

HOLT, C.J., who delivered the opinion of the court, treated the case as one of interference with the plaintiffs’ trade, consisting in the capture and sale of wild fowl. He distinguishes it from the case of invading a franchise, which, I apprehend, would, in itself, amount to a legal wrong, and thus states the law applicable to it:

“When a violent or malicious act is done to a man’s occupation, profession, or way of getting a livelihood, then an action lies in all cases.”

I see no reason to doubt that by a “violent act” the learned Chief Justice had in view an act of violence done in such circumstances as to make it amount to a legal wrong; and I see as little reason why, in speaking of a “malicious act,” he should not be understood as using the word “malicious” in its proper legal sense, and as referring to other wrongs, not accompanied by violence but done intentionally, and, therefore, in the eye of the law maliciously. The object of an act, that is, the results which will necessarily or naturally follow from the circumstances in which it is committed, may give it a wrongful character, but it ought not to be confounded with the motive of the actor. To discharge a loaded gun is, in many circumstances, a perfectly harmless proceeding; to fire it on the highway, in front of a restive horse, might be a very different matter. The learned Chief Justice proceeds to give various illustrations of the general rule which he had formulated. He first notices a case in which it had been held that a schoolmaster had no cause of action against a defendant, who had attracted his pupils and injured his school by setting up a rival establishment, a proceeding which was obviously in the ordinary course of competition, and then adds :

“But suppose Mr. Hickeringill should lie in the way with his gun, and fright the boys from going to school, and their parents would not let them go thither; sure that schoolmaster might have an action for the loss of his scholars.”

From that observation I see no reason to differ, because, in my opinion, frightening a child with a gun, so that it cannot get to school, is in itself a violent and unlawful act, directed both against the child and its schoolmaster. The learned Chief Justice then refers to three instances in which the defendant would be liable in an action upon the case: (i) where he obstructs a person in charge of a horse, who is taking it to a market for sale, and prevents his reaching the market, thereby depriving the market-owner of his dues; (ii) where, to the detriment of a proprietor, he by threats frightens away his tenants at will; and (iii) when he beats the servant of a taxman, and so hinders him from taking his master's tolls. It must be observed that, apart from any question of motive, all these cases involve the use of means in themselves illegal,—obstruction, coercion by means of threats, and personal assault.

But assuming, what, to my mind, is by no means clear, that Keeble v. Hickeringill (8) was meant to decide that an evil motive will render unlawful an act which otherwise would be lawful, it is necessary to consider how far that anomalous principle has been recognised in subsequent decisions. Laying aside the recent decisions which are under review in this appeal, only one case has been cited to us in which the court professed that they were guided by the reasoning of HOLT, C.J. That instance is to be found in Carrington v. Taylor (7), a decision which I venture to think no English court would, at this day, care to repeat. The facts of the case resembled those which occurred in Keeble v. Hickeringill (8) in this single respect, that the plaintiff was the owner of a decoy for wild fowl. The defendant was the owner of a boat, in which he rowed along the coast, and earned a livelihood by shooting wild fowl for the market, which he was lawfully entitled to do. But some of the shots fired by him in the pursuit of that occupation had the effect of scaring birds which otherwise would or might have entered the plaintiff's decoy; and, in respect of that disturbance he was held liable in damages to the plaintiff. Whatever construction might be put upon the judgment of HOLT, C.J., it does not appear to me to contain a single expression which would justify that result. I am not surprised to find that an eminent judge, with whose opinion as a whole I am unable to concur, has had the courage to express his dissent from the judgment in Carrington v. Taylor (7), as he failed “to see what wrong the defendant in that case had done.” To my mind, the case is of considerable importance, because it shows that, in the year 1809, the Court of King's Bench did not regard Keeble v. Hickeringill (8) as establishing the doctrine that a lawful act, done with intent to injure, will afford a cause of action. In the case before them there was no allegation and no evidence of any intent to injure the plaintiff's decoy. The sole motive of the defendant in firing his gun was to earn his livelihood by killing wild fowl for the market. I cannot avoid the conclusion that the learned judges accepted Keeble v. Hickeringill (8) as an authority to the effect that, apart from any question of motive, the disturbance of a lawful decoy is an illegal invasion of the private right of its proprietor.

A variety of well-known cases, including even Lumley v. Gye (11), were relied on by the respondents as showing that the so-called principle of Keeble v. Hickeringill (8) has been from time to time applied by the English courts since the date of

A that judgment. Except in Carrington v. Taylor (7), which I have already noticed, I have been unable to discover in these authorities, which I do not consider it necessary to examine in detail, any trace of the doctrine for which the respondents contend, until recent years, when it is first dimly foreshadowed in a dictum which occurs in Bowen v. Hall (10), and is subsequently developed in Temperton v. Russell (33) and in the present case. The authorities antecedent to Bowen v. Hall (10) as well as that decision itself, are all cases belonging to one or other of these three classes: (i) Cases of privilege, where the perpetrator of an act, which per se constituted a legal wrong, was protected from its usual consequences in the event of its being proved that he was actuated by an honest desire to fulfil a public or private duty; (ii) cases in which the act complained of was in itself a plain violation of private right: and (iii) cases in which an act detrimental to others, but affording no remedy against the immediate actor, had been procured by illegal means.

The early case of Garret v. Taylor (9) furnishes an apt illustration of the third class. According to the report, which is very brief, the plaintiff, a quarryman, complained that the defendant had by threats to "mayhem" and annoy them with litigation, induced or coerced some of his customers to discontinue buying stones from his quarry. Decree passed in absence, and the case was re-heard on an appeal brought by the defendant in arrest of judgment upon the ground that the declaration did not disclose any cause of action. The declaration (1 Bac. Ab. 53, 54) discloses facts, which, if true, as they were necessarily assumed to be, did amount to illegal means used in order to influence the action of the plaintiff's customers. One learned judge has assumed that the judgment went on the principle that every man "has a right to carry on his trade without disturbance," a proposition not involved in the case, but one to which I should not deny if he meant "illegal" disturbance. The decision really went upon the terms of the declaration, which appear to me to disclose a clear case of the employment of unlawful means. I am not at present prepared to hold that threats of vexatious litigation, which might cause anxious apprehension in the minds of many, will in no circumstances amount to unlawful influence; but I entertain no doubt that these, when coupled with serious threats of personal violence, going the length of mutilation or demembration, do, when the party threatened is overcome by and yields to them, constitute legal coercion.

Tarleton v. M'Gawley (4) is a case of the same complexion. Two British ships, the Othello and the Bannister, were lying near to each other off Calabar coast, both engaged in the same kind of adventure, that of bartering their cargoes for palm oil and other West African produce. A canoe manned by natives desiring to trade was approaching the Bannister for that purpose, when the master of the Othello directed against it, and fired a cannon loaded with gunpowder and shot, and killed one of its crew, an outrage which occasioned such a panic among the native tribes that the season's trade of the Bannister was lost. The master of the Othello was held to be responsible for that result, which was the direct and natural consequence of his wrongful and criminal act. The case was just the same as if some person had persisted in firing bullets at all and sundry who were about to enter a particular shop, with the effect of driving away its customers and ruining the shopkeeper's business. Such an act could not be reasonably described as lawful but for the motive by which it was dictated.

I In my opinion, no light is thrown upon the decision of the present question by Pitt v. Donovan (34), and other cases of that class. The defendant had, in that case, represented, contrary to the fact that the plaintiff was insane at the time when he executed a particular deed. The communication was made to a person to whom the defendant was under a legal duty to make the disclosure if it had been true, and the defendant was in law absolved from the ordinary consequences of his having circulated a libel which was false and injurious, if he honestly believed it to be true. The law applicable in cases of that description is, I apprehend, beyond all doubt; but the rule by which the law, in certain exceptional cases excuses the perpetration of a wrong by reason of the absence of evil motive, is insufficient to establish or to support the converse and very different proposition, that the presence of an evil motive will convert a legal act into a legal wrong. A

Lumley v. Gye (11) is a weighty authority in this branch of the law, but it does not lend any aid to the respondents' argument. It was an action for damages against a defendant who had induced a professional singer to break her engagement with the plaintiff, to his detriment, and it was resisted mainly upon the ground B that the engagement broken did not constitute the relationship of master and servant between the contracting parties. That plea was overruled, and the defendant found liable. The principle of the decision (from which COLERIDGE, J., alone dissented) was clearly explained by ERLE, J., whose opinion is in complete accordance with the views expressed by the other learned judges who constituted the majority of the court. He said (2 E. & B. at pp. 231, 232): C

"The authorities are numerous and uniform that an action will lie against a person who procures that a servant should unlawfully leave his service. The principle involved in these cases comprises the present, for there the right of action in the matter arises from the wrongful act of the defendant in procuring that the person hired should break his contract by putting an end to the relation D of employer and employed, and the present case is the same. . . . It is clear that the procurement of the violation of a right is a cause of action in all cases where the violation is an actionable wrong."

These statements embody an intelligible and a salutary principle, and they contain a full explanation of the law upon which the case was decided. He who wilfully E induces another to do an unlawful act which, but for his persuasion, would or might never have been committed, is rightly held to be responsible for the wrong which he procured. None of the learned judges made any reference to Keeble v. Hickeringill (8), and not a single expression is to be found in their opinions tending to suggest that an injurious motive can impart a wrongful character either to a lawful act or to its procurement by means which are not in themselves illegal. F

In Bowen v. Hall (10) the wrong complained of was the intentional inducing of a breach of contract, to the detriment of the plaintiff, who was obviously entitled to succeed if Lumley v. Gye (11) had been well decided. According to the opinion expressed by ERLE, J., and the other judges of the majority in that case, the defendant in Bowen v. Hall (10) had been guilty of a wrong which was in the sense of law malicious, because he had knowingly procured the commission of an illegal act. G The judgment in Lumley v. Gye (11) was followed by the EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C., and BRETT, L.J., while LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., adhered to the opposite view, which had been taken by COLERIDGE J. BRETT, L.J., in delivering the judgment of LORD SELBORNE and himself, substantially affirms the reasoning of the majority in Lumley v. Gye (11), but there are one or two sentences in his judgment relating to points with which the learned judges who decided that case did not deal, and which H were not raised by the facts either of Lumley v. Gye (11) or of the case before him. His Lordship said (6 Q.B.D. at p. 338):

"Merely to persuade a man to break his contract may not be wrongful in law or fact, as in the second case put by COLERIDGE, J. But if the persuasion be used for the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff, or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff, it is a malicious act which is in law I or in fact a wrong act, and, therefore, a wrongful act, and therefore, an actionable act, if injury ensues from it. We think that it cannot be doubted that a malicious act such as is above described is a wrongful act in law and in fact."

These words are obviously susceptible of two very different constructions, according as they are understood to refer to the procurement of an act which is in violation of the law, and, therefore, a legal wrong, or to the procurement of a lawful act. Prima facie they would have appeared to me to refer to the procuring of an illegal act because the assumption upon which the whole passage is framed is that there has been successful persuasion to break a contract, which is an undoubted violation of the law; and, in that case, there would be a malicious wrong, as it is defined in Lumley v. Gye (11). But the words have now been explained by their author to mean, not merely that the procuring of an unlawful act, with intent to injure, is a malicious wrong, giving a good cause of action, but that the presence of injurious intent in the mind of the procurer gives a good cause of action, although the act procured is in itself lawful. In that aspect of them, the words can only be regarded as obiter dicta, because no such question was raised by the circumstances of the case.

I do not think it necessary to notice at length Temperton v. Russell (33) in which substantially the same reasons were assigned by LORD ESHER, M.R., and LOPES, L.J., as in the present case. It is, to my mind, very doubtful whether, in that case, there was any question before the court with regard to the effect of the animus of the actor in making that unlawful which would otherwise have been lawful. The only findings of the jury which the court had to consider were (i) that the defendants had maliciously induced certain persons to break their contracts with the plaintiffs, and (ii) that the defendants had maliciously conspired to induce, and had thereby induced certain persons not to make contracts with the plaintiffs. There having been undisputed breaches of contract by the persons found to have been induced, the first of these findings raised the same question which had been disposed of in Lumley v. Gye (11). According to the second finding, the persons induced merely refused to make contracts, which was not a legal wrong on their part; but the defendants who induced were found to have accomplished their object, to the injury of the plaintiffs, by means of unlawful conspiracy—a clear ground of liability according to Lumley v. Gye (11), if, as the court held, there was evidence to prove it.

I am quite alive to the fact that the question which we have to decide is one of importance, and also that it has never been previously considered by this House. Having come to the conclusion, with the majority of your Lordships who have heard the appeal, that the doctrine advanced by the respondents is neither sound in principle nor supported by authority, I move that the order appealed from be reversed, and judgment entered for the appellant, and that the appellant have his costs of this appeal, and costs in both courts below, including the costs of the trial.

LORD ASHBOURNE (read by LORD MORRIS).—The controversy in this case is between the plaintiffs, who are shipwrights, and members of the Shipwrights' Provident Union, and the defendant, Allen, a member and the London delegate of the Independent Society of Boilermakers and Iron and Steel Shipbuilders. It is not a dispute between employers and employed—between capital and labour—but rather one between the members of one trades union and of another trades union, and on the facts of the case there is little real difference. Was there evidence, fit to be submitted to the jury, of coercion by the defendant of the Glengall Co. to terminate their employment of the plaintiffs? Was there evidence that the defendant intimidated and coerced the Glengall Co. not to enter into new contracts with the plaintiffs? Was there evidence that the defendant maliciously induced the company not to engage the plaintiffs? I am unable myself to see room for doubt that there was ample evidence of such conduct on the part of the defendant, and there is no question that it damaged the plaintiffs. I would infer even from the evidence of the defendant himself that the rules of the Boilermakers' Society, as was clearly testified by their general secretary and chairman, would not support punishing the plaintiffs for their past action by procuring their dismissal from an employment where they were working blamelessly. I would also gather from his evidence that the defendant himself on consideration would not say that such conduct was right. He was asked: "Were the men right or wrong according to your opinion in declining to act with Flood and Taylor because of something they had done in the past?" and his reply was: "That would be wrong, of course, according to the rules of our society if they left their work, but they did not take such action." A

But the question here is not on the rules of the society, or on the opinions of the defendant on reflection, but whether there was evidence of his alleged conduct for the jury. The question is: Have the plaintiffs a remedy for their loss found to have been caused by the defendant? The plaintiffs had, in my opinion, a clear right to pursue their lawful calling—to have the full benefit of their employment—and the right to enjoy the legitimate, reasonable, and probable expectation of a continuance of their employment. It would be, I think, an unsatisfactory state of the law if it allowed the wilful invader of such a right without lawful cause or justification to escape from the consequences of his action, if it would not hold him liable for maliciously inducing men being denied their accustomed employment, and would not afford to those he had injured legal grounds of action. B C

The law is stated with precision and vigour by SIR WILLIAM ERLE in his work on TRADES UNIONS, p. 12. [HIS LORDSHIP read the passage quoted by the Lord Chancellor at p. 60 ante, and continued]. In my opinion, this is a clear statement of the law, and I have heard no satisfactory attempt to answer or explain it away. It is supported, not only by good sense and by those considerations of justice and fair play one would expect to find in any legal system, but by a mass of powerful authority. HOLT, C.J., in Keeble v. Hickeringill (8), laid it down with clearness and certainty that "he that hinders another in his trade or livelihood is liable to an action for so doing." In no subsequent decision of any court has doubt been thrown upon the effect of that authority, or a suggestion made that the weighty conclusion of HOLT, C.J., could with advantage to our law be reviewed or pushed aside. The reason it has not been questioned is because, as I conceive, it rested firmly on the great common law principle that every man has a right to carry on his trade without disturbance. Tarleton v. M'Gawley (4), decided in 1794, strongly supports the view that such a right was the settled law of this country, for it was then held that an action lay against the master of a vessel for purposely firing a cannon at negroes and thereby preventing them from trading with the plaintiff, and it was pointed out that "the defendant had expressed an intention not to permit any to trade until a debt due from the natives to himself was satisfied." D E F

I need not go in detail through Lumley v. Gye (11) which for nearly half a century has passed into the regular current of legal authority, and was followed by LORD SELBORNE, L.C., and BRETT, L.J., in Bowen v. Hall (10). In the Mogul Case (3) it was apparently accepted as undoubted law that a trader has a right to carry on his business without disturbance except in the way of fair competition. BOWEN, L.J., there says (23 Q.B.D. at p. 614): G

"No man, whether trader or not can justify damaging another in his commercial business by fraud or misrepresentation. Intimidation, obstruction, and molestation are forbidden; so is the intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other, assuming always that there is no just cause for it. The intentional driving away of customers by show of violence; the obstruction of actors on the stage by preconcerted hissing; the disturbance of wildfowl in decoys by the firing of guns; the impeding or threatening servants or workmen; the inducing persons under personal contracts to break their contracts, all are instances of such forbidden acts." H I

It is worthy of note that this great judge refers expressly to Keeble v. Hickeringill (8) as clear and accepted law, as did LORD BRAMWELL and LORD FIELD in this House. The fact that the plaintiffs could make no claim against the Glengall Co., and that what the company did was, as between them and the plaintiffs, not unlawful, cannot, I think, exonerate the defendant from liability for his own wrongful conduct. On the question of the evidence of "malice" in the defendant, I do not think I could with advantage add anything to what has been so well and so fully said by the Lord Chancellor.

The last case I desire to refer to is Temperton v. Russell (33), tried before HENX COLLINS, J., whose direction was confirmed by the Court of Appeal, where LORD ESHER, M.R., gave it as his opinion that there was no real distinction between a malicious inducement to break a contract, and a malicious inducement not to enter into new contracts of service. The consequences to a workman so treated are alike disastrous; he depends for his bread upon his existing and future contracts. To intimidate an employer into breaking a contract with a particular workman, and to coerce or maliciously induce an otherwise willing employer not to give him future employment, alike does that workman serious damage in his trade, and prevents him from earning his wages. The object of the wrong-doer is the same in each case. Here the motive of the defendant was founded on the determination to inflict punishment on the plaintiffs for their past action by driving them out of their employment. In my opinion, there was evidence that the defendant acted without legal excuse or justification in invading the right of the plaintiffs to exercise their calling without hindrance, and there was evidence to go to the jury that the defendant intimidated and coerced or maliciously induced the Glengall Iron Co. not to enter into new contracts with the plaintiffs. I entirely concur in the conclusion of the Lord Chancellor, and think that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I do not think that the case can properly be dealt with on the assumption that the finding of the jury involves a finding that the version of what passed given by the plaintiffs' witnesses was the correct one. I do not share the opinion of the learned judge that the point upon which there was a conflict of testimony has a bearing on the question. The question is whether the findings of the jury entitled the plaintiffs to judgment. After a careful and prolonged consideration of the arguments addressed to your Lordships when the case was first presented at the Bar of this House, I arrived at the conclusion that the question must be answered in the negative. I have since carefully reconsidered the matter in view of the opinions expressed by the learned judges who were summoned on the occasion of the second argument, but I have seen no ground for changing my opinion.

It is to be observed, in the first place, that the company in declining to employ the plaintiffs were violating no contract; they were doing nothing wrongful in the eye of the law. The course which they took was dictated by self-interest; they were anxious to avoid the inconvenience to their business which would ensue from a cessation of work on the part of the ironworkers. It was not contended at the Bar that merely to induce them to take this course would constitute a legal wrong, but it was said to do so because the person inducing them acted maliciously. LORD ESHER, M.R., declined in the present case to define what was meant by "maliciously"; he considered this a question to be determined by a jury. But if acts are, or are not, unlawful and actionable, according as this element of malice be present or absent, I think it essential to determine what is meant by it. I can imagine no greater danger to the community than that a jury should be at liberty to impose the penalty of paying damages for acts which are otherwise lawful because they choose, without any legal definition of the term, to say that they are malicious. No one would know what his rights were. The result would be to put all our actions at the mercy of a particular tribunal whose view of their propriety might differ from our own.

However malice may be defined, if motive be an ingredient of it, my sense of the danger would not be diminished. The danger is, I think, emphasised by the opinions of some of the learned judges. In a case to which I shall refer immediately, LORD ESHER, M.R., included within his definition of malicious acts persuasion used for the purpose "of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff." WILLS, J., thinks this "going a great deal too far," and that whether the act complained of was malicious depends upon whether the defendant has, in pursuing his own interests, "done so by such means and with such a disregard of his neighbour as no honest and fair-minded man ought to resort to." Here it will be seen that malice is not made dependent on motive. The assumed motive is a legitimate one, the pursuit of one's own interests. The malice depends on the means used and the disregard of one's neighbour, and the test of its existence is whether these are such as no honest and fair-minded man ought to resort to. There is here room for infinite differences of opinion. Some, I daresay, applying this test, would consider that a strike by workmen at a time damaging to the employer or a "lock-out" by an employer at a time of special hardship to the workmen were such means and exhibited such a disregard of his neighbour as an honest and fair-minded man ought not to resort to. Others would be of the contrary opinion. The truth is that this suggested test makes men's responsibility for their actions depend on the fluctuating opinions of the tribunal before whom the case may chance to come as to what a right-minded man ought or ought not to do in pursuing his own interests. Again, CAVE, J., expressed the view that the action of the appellant might have been justified on the principles of trade competition if it had been confined to the time when the men were doing iron work, but that it "was without just cause or excuse, and consequently malicious," inasmuch as the respondents were not at the time engaged upon iron work. On the other hand, it is evident, from the reasoning of some of the learned judges who think the respondents entitled to succeed, that they would not be prepared to adopt this distinction, and would regard the act as "malicious" in either case.

The present case was treated in the court below as governed practically by the previous decisions of the same court in Bowen v. Hall (10), and Temperton v. Russell (33). The former of these cases was an action brought against the defendant for maliciously inducing a person who had entered into a contract of service with the plaintiff to break that contract. It raised, for the first time in the Court of Appeal, the question whether Lumley v. Gye (11) was rightly decided. BRETT, L.J., delivered the judgment of the court, in which LORD SELBORNE, L.C., concurred, LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., dissenting. The law was thus laid down in the judgment of the majority of the court (6 Q.B.D. at p. 338):

"Merely to persuade a person to break his contract may not be wrongful in law or fact as in the second case put by COLERIDGE, J. But if the persuasion be used for the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff, or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff, it is a malicious act, which is in law and in fact a wrong act, and therefore a wrongful act, and therefore an actionable act, if injury ensues from it. We think that it cannot be doubted that a malicious act, such as is above described, is a wrongful act in law and in fact."

This case was followed, and the view of the law thus expressed was re-asserted by LORD ESHER, M.R., in Temperton v. Russell (33).

It will be seen that "malicious" is here defined as the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff, or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff. It is said that a malicious act thus defined is in law and in fact, a wrong act, and, therefore, a wrongful act. I am not sure that I quite understand what is meant by saying that it is "in fact" a wrong act, as distinguished from its being so in "in law," and that because so wrong it is therefore wrongful. I can only understand it as meaning that it is an act morally wrong. The law does not certainly profess to treat as a legal wrong every act which may be disapproved of in point of morality; but, further, I cannot agree that all persuasion where the object is to benefit the person who uses the persuasion at the expense of another is morally wrong. Numberless instances might be put in which such persuasion, which is of constant occurrence in the affairs of life, would not be regarded by any one as reprehensible. The judgment is grounded almost wholly upon the presence of this element, that

A the purpose of the inducement is to injure the plaintiff or to benefit the defendant at his expense. The fact that the act which is induced by the persuasion is the breach of a contract with the plaintiff is treated as a subordinate matter, which without this element would not be a wrong act, or an act wrongful, and therefore actionable. The motive of the person who did the act complained of was thus treated as the gist of the action.

B In Temperton v. Russell (33), the further step was taken by the majority of the court—A. L. SMITH, L.J., reserving his opinion on the point—of asserting that it was immaterial that the act induced was not the breach of a contract, but only the not entering into a contract, provided that the motive of desiring to injure the plaintiff, or to benefit the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff, was present. It seems to have been regarded as only a small step from the one decision to the other, and it was said that there seemed to be no good reason why, if an action lay for maliciously inducing a breach of contract, it should not equally lie for maliciously inducing a person not to enter into a contract. So far from thinking it a small step from the one decision to the other, I think there is a chasm between them. The reason for a distinction between the two cases appears to me to be this: that in the one case the act procured was the violation of a legal right, for which the person doing the act which injured the plaintiff could be sued, as well as the person who procured it, while in the other case, as no legal right was violated by the person who did the act from which the plaintiff suffered, he would not be liable to be sued in respect of the act done, while the person who induced him to do the act would be liable to an action. I think this was an entirely new departure.

E A study of Lumley v. Gye (11) has satisfied me that in that case a majority of the court regarded the circumstance that what the defendant procured was a breach of contract as the essence of the cause of action. It is true that the word "maliciously" was to be found in the declaration the validity of which was then under consideration, but I do not think that the learned judges regarded the allegation as involving the necessity of proving an evil motive on the part of the defendant, but merely as implying that the defendant had wilfully and knowingly procured a breach of contract. Indeed, CROMPTON, J., appears to me to indicate this in express terms. He says (2 E. & B. at p. 224):

G "It must now be considered clear law that a person who wrongfully and maliciously, or, which is the same thing, with notice interrupts the relation subsisting between master and servant by procuring the servant to depart from the master's service, or by harbouring and keeping him as servant after he has quitted it, and during the time stipulated for as the period of service, whereby the master is injured, commits a wrongful act, for which he is responsible at law."

H He then proceeds to consider whether the same law is applicable to a contract for future service in the case of a theatrical singer. ERLE, J., said (ibid. at p. 231):

I "The authorities are numerous and uniform that an action will lie by a master against a person who procures that a servant shall unlawfully leave his service. The principle involved in these cases comprises the present, for there the right of action in the master arises from the wrongful act of the defendant in procuring that the person hired should break his contract by putting an end to the relation of employer and employed."

Not a word, be it observed, is said about the motive as constituting an element in the wrongful act. This is made, if possible, clearer by the answer which the learned judge gives to the objection that this class of actions for procuring the breach of a contract of hiring rested upon no principle, and ought not to be extended beyond the cases theretofore decided relating to trade, manufacture, or household service. The learned judge said (ibid. at p. 232):

"The answer appears to me to be that the class of cases referred to rests upon the principle that the procurement of the violation of the right is a cause of action, and that when this principle is applied to a violation of a right arising upon a contract of hiring the nature of the service contracted for is immaterial."

I think the view of WIGHTMAN, J., was substantially the same. He relies much upon Winsmore v. Greenbank (19). In relation to that case he says (ibid. at p. 238):

"It was, prima facie, an unlawful act of the wife to live apart from her husband, and it was unlawful, and therefore tortious in the defendant to procure and persuade her to do an unlawful act, and as damage to the plaintiff was thereby occasioned, an action on the case was held maintainable. This case appears to me to be an exceedingly strong authority in the plaintiff's favour. It was undoubtedly, prima facie, an unlawful act on the part of Miss Wagner to break her contract, and therefore a tortious act of the defendant maliciously to procure her to do so."

It is true the learned judge here uses the word "maliciously," but I think he means no more by this than "wilfully and knowing that he was procuring an unlawful act." The essence of the tort was manifestly regarded by the learned judge as the procuring one person to do an unlawful act to the injury of another.

In Winsmore v. Greenbank (19), upon which the learned judge relied as a strong authority in support of the plaintiff's case, there was not even an allegation of malice. The allegation was that the defendant "unlawfully and unjustly" procured a wife not to return to her husband, whereby he was damnified. WILLES, C.J., in his judgment, said, in answer to objections that were taken to the pleadings (Willes, at p. 583):

"It must be an unlawful procuring, and it need not be shown on the pleadings how it is unlawful. It was said that it was necessary for the plaintiff to add 'by false insinuations,' but it is not material to add whether they were true or false. If they were true, and by means of them the defendant persuaded the plaintiff's wife to do an unlawful act, it was unlawful in the defendant."

Upon a review, then, of the judgments in Lumley v. Gye (11), I am satisfied that the procuring what was described as an unlawful act, namely, a breach of contract, was regarded as the gist of the action. I think the judgment would have been precisely the same if, instead of the word "maliciously," the words "wilfully and with notice of the contract," had been found in the declaration. Every word of the reasoning of the three learned judges would have been equally applicable to that case. I am not concerned now to inquire whether the decision in Lumley v. Gye (11) was right. I admit the force of the reasons given by the learned judges for holding that an action lies not only against a person who breaks a contract, but against anyone procuring a breach of contract to the detriment of the plaintiff. There are, however, arguments the other way, and I must not be understood as expressing an opinion one way or the other whether such an action can be maintained. It is certainly a general rule of our law that an act prima facie lawful is not unlawful and actionable on account of the motive which dictated it. I put aside the case of conspiracy, which is anomalous in more than one respect.

It has recently been held in this House in Bradford Corp'n. v. Pickles (24) that acts done by the defendant upon his own land were not actionable when they were within his legal rights, even though his motive were to prejudice his neighbour. The language of the noble and learned Lords was distinct. LORD HALSBURY said ([1895] A.C. at p. 594):

"This is not a case where the state of mind of the person doing the act can affect the right. If it was a lawful act, however ill the motive be, he had a right to do it. If it was an unlawful act, however good the motive might be, he would have no right to do it."

The statement was confined to the class of case then before the House, but I apprehend that what was said is not applicable only to rights of property, but is equally applicable to the exercise by an individual of his other rights.

The common law on the subject was emphatically expressed by PARKE, B., in delivering the judgment of the court in Stevenson v. Newnham (35). In that case the question was whether a declaration was good which averred that the defendant "maliciously" distrained for more rent than was due. It was held that the allegation of malice did not make it good. PARKE, B., said :

"An act which does not amount to a legal injury cannot be actionable because it is done with a bad intent."

More than one of the learned judges who were summoned refers with approval to the definition of malice by BAYLEY, J., in Bromage v. Prosser (12) (4 B. & C. at p. 255) :

"Malice in common acceptation of the term means ill-will against a person, but in its legal sense it means a wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse."

It will be observed that this definition eliminates motive altogether. It includes only "wrongful" acts intentionally done. I may remark in passing that I am quite unable to see how the definition assists the respondents. It seems to me to tell the other way. In the present case the contention is that the malicious motive makes "wrongful" an act that otherwise would not be so.

It may be convenient here to refer to Green v. General Omnibus Co., Ltd. (36), which was relied on as showing that a malicious motive may make actionable acts otherwise innocent. In my opinion, it affords no support to such a proposition. Acts were charged in the declaration which manifestly interfered with the plaintiff in the free use of the highway to which he was entitled. The declaration averred that he was obstructed in the use of it. It was demurred to on the ground that a corporation could not be guilty of malice, and that this was of the essence of the cause of action. The decision was only that the declaration was good. It was held that a malicious motive was essential. ERLE, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, stated as the grounds of the demurrer that the declaration charged "a wilful and intentional wrong," and that the defendants being a corporation could not be guilty of such a wrong. He obviously gave the averment of malice the meaning attributed to it by BAYLEY, J., in the case just referred to, namely, that the wrongful acts were done intentionally.

Great stress was laid at the Bar on the circumstance that in an action for maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause putting in motion legal process an evil motive is an essential ingredient. I have always understood, and I think it has been the general understanding, that this was an exceptional case. The person against whom proceedings have been initiated without reasonable and probable cause is prima facie wronged. It might well have been held that an action always lay for thus putting the law in motion. But I apprehend that the person taking proceedings was saved from liability if he acted in good faith, because it was thought that men might otherwise be too much deterred from enforcing the law, and that this would be disadvantageous to the public. Some of the learned judges cite actions of libel and slander as instances in which the legal liability depends on the presence or absence of malice. I think this a mistake. The man who defames another by false allegations is liable to an action, however good his motive, and however honestly he believed in the statement he made. It is true that in a limited class of cases the law, under certain circumstances, regards the occasion as privileged, and exonerates the person who has made false defamatory statements from liability if he has made them in good faith. But if there be not that duty or interest which in law creates the privilege, then, though the person making the statements may have acted from the best of motives, and felt it his duty to make them, he is none the less liable. The gist of the action is that the statement was false and defamatory. Because in a strictly limited class of cases the law allows the defence that the statements were made in good faith, it seems to me, with all deference, illogical to affirm that malice constitutes one of the elements of the torts known to the law as libel and slander. But even if it could be established that in cases falling within certain well-defined categories, it is settled law that an evil motive renders actionable acts otherwise innocent, that is surely far from showing that such a motive always makes actionable acts prejudicial to another which are otherwise lawful, or that it does so in cases like the present utterly dissimilar from those within the categories referred to.

The question raised by the decision under appeal is one of vast importance and wide-reaching consequences. In Temperton v. Russell (33) it was held that the principle of Lumley v. Gye (11) and Bowen v. Hall (10) was not confined to breaches of contract of service, but applied to breaches of any contract. The law laid down in Bowen v. Hall (10) in terms applies to all contracts, and I quite agree that the nature of the contract can make no difference. If the judgment under appeal is to stand, and the fact that the act procured was unlawful as being a breach of contract be immaterial, it follows that every person who persuades another not to enter into any contract with a third person may be sued by that third person if the object were to benefit himself at the expense of such person. Such a case is within the very words employed in Bowen v. Hall (10) as applied in the present judgment. I do not think it possible to maintain such a proposition. It would obviously apply where one trader induced another not to contract with a third person with whom he was in negotiation, but to make the contract with himself instead, a proceeding which occurs every day, and the legitimacy of which no one would question. Yet it is within the very language used in Bowen v. Hall (10). He induces a person not to enter into a contract with a third person, and his object is to benefit himself at the expense of the person who would otherwise have obtained the contract, and thus necessarily to injure him by depriving him of it.

It was said at the Bar that there was an exception in favour of trade competition. I know of no ground for saying that such an exercise of individual right is treated with exceptional favour by the law. But it is possible to give many illustrations to which no such answer would apply. I give one. A landowner persuades another to sell him a piece of land for which a neighbour is negotiating. It is so situated that it will improve the value of the property of whichever of them obtains it. His motive is to benefit himself at his neighbour's expense; he induces the owner of the land not to contract with his neighbour. The case is within the terms of the judgment in Bowen v. Hall (10). Would it be possible to contend that an action lay in such a case? If the fact be that malice is the gist of the action for inducing or procuring an act to be done to the prejudice of another, and not that the act induced or procured is an unlawful one as being a breach of contract or otherwise, I can see no possible ground for confining the action to cases in which the thing induced is the not entering into a contract. It seems to me that it must equally lie in the case of every lawful act which one man induces another to do where his purpose is to injure his neighbour or to benefit himself at his expense. I cannot hold that such a proposition is tenable in principle, and no authority is to be found for it. I should be the last to suggest that the fact that there was no precedent was in all cases conclusive against the right to maintain an action. It is the function of the courts to apply established legal principles to the changing circumstances and conditions of human life. But the motive of injuring one's neighbour or of benefiting oneself at his expense is as old as human nature. It must for centuries have moved men in countless instances to persuade others to do or to refrain from doing particular acts. The fact that under such circumstances no authority for an action founded on these elements has been discovered, does go far to show that such an action cannot be maintained.

A I think these considerations (subject to a point which I will presently discuss) sufficient to show that the present action cannot be maintained. It is said that the statement that the defendant would call men out, if made, was a threat. It is this aspect of the case which has obviously greatly influenced some of the learned judges. HAWKINS, J., says that the defendant without excuse or justification and that the plaintiffs are, therefore, entitled to maintain this action. But “excuse or justification” is only needed where an act is prima facie wrongful. Whether the defendant’s act was so is the matter to be determined. To say that the defendant acted “unlawfully,” is, with all respect, to beg the question which is whether he did so or not? To describe his acts as unjust and tyrannical proves nothing, for these epithets may be, and are, in popular language constantly applied to acts which are within a man’s rights, and unquestionably lawful. In my opinion, these epithets do not advance us a step towards the answer to the question which has to be solved.

D The proposition is, therefore, reduced to this, that the appellant invaded the plaintiffs’ right by intimidating and coercing their employers. In another passage, in his opinion, the learned judge says that there is no authority for the proposition that to render threats, menaces, intimidation, or coercion available as elements in a cause of action, they must be of such a character as to create fear of personal violence. I quite agree with this. The threat of violence to property is equally a threat in the eye of the law. And many other instances might be given. On the other hand, it is undeniable that the terms “threat,” “coercion,” and even “intimidation” are often applied in popular language to utterances which are quite lawful and give rise to no liability either civil or criminal. They mean no more than this, that the so-called threat puts pressure, perhaps extreme pressure, on the person to whom it is addressed, to take a particular course. Of this again, numberless instances might be given. Even then, if it can be said without abuse of language that the employers were “intimidated and coerced” by the appellant, even if this be in a certain sense true, it by no means follows that he committed a wrong or is under any legal liability for his act. Everything depends on the nature of the representation or statement by which the pressure was exercised. The law cannot regard the act differently because you choose to call it a threat or coercion instead of an intimation or warning.

I understood it to be admitted at the Bar, and it was indeed stated by one of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal, that it would have been perfectly lawful for all the ironworkers to leave their employment and not to accept a subsequent engagement to work in the company of the plaintiffs. At all events I cannot doubt that this would have been so. I cannot doubt either that the appellant or the authorities of the union would equally have acted within his or their rights if he or they had “called the men out.” They were members of the union. It was for them to determine whether they would become so or not, and whether they would follow or not follow the instructions of its authorities, though no doubt if they had refused to obey any instructions which, under the rules of the union, it was competent for the authorities to give, they might have lost the benefits they derived from membership. It is not for your Lordships to express any opinion on the policy of trade unions, membership of which may undoubtedly influence the action of those who have joined them. They are now recognised by law; there are combinations of employers as well as of employed. The members of these unions, of whichever class they are composed, act in the interest of their class. If they resort to unlawful acts they may be indicted or sued. If they do not resort to unlawful acts they are entitled to further their interests in the manner which seems to them best and most likely to be effectual.

If, then, the men had ceased to work for the company either of their own A motion, or because they were "called out," and the company in order to secure their return had thought it expedient no longer to employ the plaintiffs they could certainly have maintained no action. Yet the damage to them would have been just the same. The employers would have been subjected to precisely the same "coercion and intimidation," save that it was by act and not by prospect of the act; they would have yielded in precisely the same way to the pressure put upon B them, and been actuated by the same motive, and the aim of those who exercised the pressure would have been precisely the same. The only difference would have been the additional result that the company also might have suffered loss. I am quite unable to conceive how the plaintiffs can have a cause of action, because, instead of the iron workers leaving either of their own motion, or because they C were called out, there was an intimation beforehand that either the one or the other of these courses could be pursued. The iron workers were employed on the terms that they might leave at the close of any day, and that, on the other hand, the employers might, if they saw fit, then discharge them. The company had employed the men, knowing that they were members of the union, and they had on one occasion, at least, dealt with the appellant as its delegate. They had no ground for complaint if the men left, as they were by contract entitled to do, whether they left D of their own motion, or followed the instructions of their union leaders. It is said that the company were in the power of the men, because of the business loss to which the withdrawal of the men would subject them. But to what was this due, if not to the act of the company themselves in employing these men under a contract which either party might any day determine? Under such circumstances, to compare the act of the company to that of the traveller who, on a pistol being E presented to his head, hands his purse to the highwayman, appears to me grotesque. The object which the appellant and the iron workers had in view was that they should be freed from the presence of men with whom they disliked working, or to prevent what they deemed an unfair interference with their rights by men who did not belong to their craft doing the work to which they had been trained. Whether we approve or disapprove of such attempted trade restrictions, it was F entirely within the right of the iron workers to take any steps, not unlawful, to prevent any of the work which they regarded as legitimately theirs being intrusted to other hands.

Some stress was laid in the court below upon the fact that the plaintiffs were not at the time in question engaged upon iron work, although immediately before G that time they had been so employed elsewhere. This, it was said, showed that the motive of the defendant and the iron workers was the "punishment" of the plaintiffs for what they had previously done. I think that the use of the word "punishment" has proved misleading. That word does not necessarily imply that vengeance is being wreaked for an act already done, though no doubt it is sometimes used in that sense. When a court of justice, for example, awards punishment H for a breach of the law, the object is not vengeance. The purpose is to deter the person who has broken the law from a repetition of his act, and to deter other persons also from committing similar breaches of the law. In the present case it was admitted that the defendants had no personal spite against the plaintiffs. His object was, at the utmost, to prevent them in the future from doing work which he thought was not within their province, but within that of the iron workers. I If he had acted in exactly the same manner as he did at a time when the plaintiffs were engaged upon iron work, his motive would have been precisely the same as it was in the present case, and the result to the plaintiffs would have been in nowise different. I am unable to see, then, that there is any difference either in point of ethics or law between the two cases. The iron workers were no more bound to work with those whose presence was disagreeable to them than the plaintiffs were bound to refuse to work because they found that this was the case. The object which the defendant and those whom he represented had in view throughout

A was what they believed to be the interest of the class to which they belonged. The step taken was a means to that end. The act which caused the damage to the plaintiffs was that of the iron company in refusing to employ them. The company would not subordinate their own interests to the plaintiffs. It is conceded that they could take this course with impunity. Why, then, should the defendant be liable because he did not subordinate the interests of those he represented to the plaintiffs? Self-interest dictated alike the act of those who caused the damage and the act which is found to have induced them to cause it.

B I have been dealing so far with the ground upon which the judgment in the court below proceeded. The learned counsel for the respondents, however, rested their arguments mainly upon a different ground, which has found favour with the learned judges, who think the plaintiffs entitled to judgment. It was contended C that the defendant, by the course he took, had interfered with the plaintiffs in their trade or calling, and that this of itself was an actionable wrong. In support of this very broad proposition reliance was mainly placed on Keeble v. Hickeringill (8). The declaration charged the defendant with firing a gun with design to damnify the plaintiff, and frighten the wildfowl from his decoy. In the report (11 East, 574, n.) D it is stated that the plaintiff was lord of a manor and had a decoy on his own ground, which was next adjoining the defendant's ground, and there the plaintiff had decoy and other ducks, of which he made profit. It was held that the action lay. In the report in 11 Mod. 75, this observation is attributed to LORD HOLT: "Suppose defendant had shot on his own ground, if he had occasion to shoot it would be one thing, but to shoot on purpose to damage the plaintiff is another thing, and a wrong." E In another report LORD HOLT is reported as saying:

"The action lies, for, first, using or making a decoy is lawful; secondly, this employment of his ground for that use is profitable to the plaintiff, as is the skill and management of that employment."

It is argued that this decision rests upon the principle that intentional interference with the trade of another is wrongful. If it was intended by the decision F to draw a distinction between firing by the defendant on his own land when the decoy was kept by the plaintiff for purposes of trade profit and doing the same act when the decoy was kept for purposes of pleasure only, I can see no ground for such a distinction. The defendant in firing upon his own land in such a way as to frighten the birds from the plaintiff's land, was either acting within his own rights G or not. If he was not, he would surely be liable, whether the plaintiff was using his land for pleasure or profit. If he was within his rights, he would not be liable in either case, and I do not see how his rights could depend on the circumstances that the plaintiff traded in ducks and did not merely use his decoy for purposes of sport, or that he sold them, and did not merely use them for consumption by his household. I cannot think that the right of action depended on the circumstance H that the plaintiff traded in ducks; and that there would have been no right of action, all other circumstances being the same, if he had not done so. The case may be supported, and the observation of LORD HOLT, which has been quoted, explained, by the circumstance that if the defendant merely fired on his own land in the ordinary use of it, his neighbour could make no complaint, while, if he was not firing for any legitimate purpose connected with the ordinary use of land, he might be held I to commit a nuisance. In this view of it, Keeble v. Hickeringill (8) has, of course, no bearing on the present case.

It is, however, treated in their opinions by the majority of the learned judges as establishing the wide and far-reaching proposition that every man has a right to pursue his trade or calling without molestation or obstruction, and that anyone who, by any act, though it be not otherwise unlawful, molests or obstructs him, is guilty of a wrong, unless he can show lawful justification or excuse for so doing. Keeble v. Hickeringill (8) was decided about two centuries ago; but I cannot find that it has ever been treated, unless it be quite recently, as establishing the broad general proposition alleged. No such proposition is to be found stated, so far as I am aware, as the ground of any decision, or in any standard text-book of the English law. In SMITH'S LEADING CASES, which were selected, and the notes on them written, by one of the most eminent lawyers of his day, Keeble v. Hickeringill (8) is not even referred to. And the first editors of the work, after MR. J. W. SMITH'S death, WILLES and KEATING, JJ., lawyers on whose eminence it is unnecessary to dilate, equally passed it by without notice. If the view taken by the majority of the learned judges whose opinions were given at the Bar, be correct, Keeble v. Hickeringill (8) ought to have been itself treated as a leading case. It has not, as I believe, been an authority on which subsequent decisions have been based, except in cases relating to the disturbance of decoys of wild birds. It is, nevertheless, suggested by the learned judges that it embodies the principle on which many subsequent cases have been decided, though it was not referred to, and the judges who pronounced the judgments were apparently unconscious of the authority they are said to have followed. It is remarkable that among these cases are Lumley v. Gye (11) and Bowen v. Hall (10) which I have already discussed. They are said by several of the judges to rest on the principle established in Keeble v. Hickeringill (8). Some of the judges, indeed, criticise adversely the grounds upon which these cases were decided, and intimate that they can only be supported on the ground taken by LORD HOLT in Keeble v. Hickeringill (8). That case however was not cited by the counsel who argued Lumley v. Gye (11) or Bowen v. Hall (10), or by any of the judges who decided them. If it establishes the proposition contended for, it is astonishing that those very learned and distinguished judges were unaware of any such legal proposition, and, instead of taking this short cut to their decision, based it upon elaborate reasoning entirely unconnected with it.

Great reliance was placed by the respondents on certain dicta of HOLT, C.J., in Keeble v. Hickeringill (8). That learned judge is reported to have said that if a violent or malicious act is done to a man's occupation, profession, or way of getting a livelihood, an action lies in all cases. And he gives the following illustrations :

"If H. should lie in the way with guns and fright boys from going to school, and their parents would not let them go thither, that schoolmaster would have an action for loss of his scholars. A man hath a market to which he hath toll of horses sold, a man is bringing his horse to market to sell, a stranger hinders and obstructs him from going to the market, an action lies, because it imports damage. Again an action on the case lies against one that by threats frightens away his tenants at will."

In all these cases I think the Chief Justice was referring to acts in themselves wrongful. Firing guns in such a manner as to terrify persons lawfully passing along the highway would, I take it, be an offence. And the other illustrations given import, I think, that the obstruction and frightening were of such a character as to be unlawful, quite independently of the motives which led to them.

Carrington v. Taylor (7) was also relied on by the respondents. It is, I believe, the only case which has been expressly based on Keeble v. Hickeringill (8). The plaintiff there possessed an ancient decoy, and the defendant sought his livelihood by shooting wildfowl from a boat on the water, for which boat, with small arms, he had a licence from the Admiralty for fishing and coasting along the shores of Essex. The decoy was near a salt creek where the tide ebbs and flows. The only proof of disturbance of the decoy by the defendant was that, being in his boat shooting wildfowl in a part of the open creek, he had fired his fowling piece, first within a quarter of a mile of the decoy and afterwards within 200 yards of it and had killed several widgeons. The judge left these facts to the jury as evidence of a wilful disturbance of the plaintiff's decoy by the defendant. The jury returned a verdict of 40s. damages and the court, on a motion for a new trial, refused to disturb the verdict. They gave no reason for their judgment. Unless a decoy possesses some peculiar privileges in the eye of the law, I confess myself quite

A unable to understand why the defendant was liable to an action or was not within his rights in shooting the wild fowl at the place he did for the purpose of gaining a livelihood, which is stated to have been his object. In any case, the decision affords no support to the contention now under consideration. For there was no allegation that the plaintiff traded in wildfowl; "great profits and advantages," in pleader's language, might well have accrued to him without his doing so. And B there was no proof that he did so. Although some of the learned judges who support the judgment below rely on this case, one at least thinks it bad law. The case is important as showing, as I think it clearly does, that the judges of the Court of King's Bench in 1809 did not regard the judgment in Keeble v. Hickeringill (8) as founded on interference with trade or dependent on the presence of malice.

C I turn now to the other cases relied on by the learned judges in support of the position on which they found their conclusion in favour of the respondents, which are said to have been decided upon the principle embodied in Keeble v. Hickeringill (8). Among the earliest of these is Garret v. Taylor (9). The declaration alleged that the plaintiff was a mason and used to sell stones and employed workmen in his stone pit. I quote from the fuller statement of the pleading in ROLLE'S REPORTS, p. 162:

whereby the plaintiff's workmen left, and he was unable to obtain others. This declaration was held to disclose a cause of action. It is suggested that it is difficult E to explain this decision, except on the ground that the law recognises in every man a right to carry on his trade without disturbance. I am unable to see the difficulty or to think that the decision rests on any principle specially relating to trade. If the plaintiff had not been a tradesman, but the owner of a house, and the same menaces had been uttered to those who came from time to time to visit him, I cannot but think that he would equally have had a cause of action. He would have F been affected prejudicially in the occupation and enjoyment of his property by acts in themselves wrongful. Again, in Tarleton v. McGawley (4), a gun was fired at a canoe coming to the plaintiff's ship, whereby one of the natives in it was killed, and so natives were deterred by fright from approaching it for the purpose of trading. It is said that the essence of the wrong in this case was that the plaintiff was disturbed in his trade. I do not think so. Can it be doubted that, if the shipowner had desired the presence of persons on board his ship for any other purpose, and the same wrongful act had deterred them from approaching the ship, the shipowner might have maintained a similar action to recover damages for any loss or inconvenience to which he had been put owing to the wrongful act of the defendant?

I will not trouble your Lordships by going through all the cases referred to. Speaking generally, I believe these actions would equally have been maintainable I if a similar wrongful act had caused damage to, or had affected the legal rights of, a person wholly unconnected with trade. In all of them the act complained of was in its nature wrongful—violence, menaces of violence, false statements. In none of them was the proposition now contended for laid down or hinted at, and they can be supported without resort to any such principle. No doubt in some of the cases referred to the wrong was of such a nature that it is difficult to imagine circum- [stances in which precisely the same wrong could have caused damage to a person not in trade, but the act was not wrongful merely because it affected the man in his trade, though it was this circumstance which occasioned him loss. Among the authorities relied on were those relating to slander of a man in the way of his trade. This action, again, was traced to the principle that a man's trade must not be interfered with. It is true that slander of a man in the way of his trade is actionable without proof of special damage; but, whatever the slander, the wrong is precisely the same—that defamatory words have been uttered. And slander of a man in the way of his office, if it be an office of profit or even of dignity, where it is one from which the holder may be removed, is actionable, without proof of special A damage, in precisely the same way as slander of a man in the way of his trade.

I now proceed to consider on principle the proposition advanced by the respondents, the alleged authorities for which I have been discussing. I do not doubt that everyone has a right to pursue his trade or employment without "molestation" or "obstruction" if those terms are used to imply some act in itself wrongful. This is only a branch of a much wider proposition, namely, that everyone has a right B to do any lawful act he pleases without molestation or obstruction. If it be intended to assert that an act not otherwise wrongful always becomes so if it interferes with another's trade or employment, and needs to be excused or justified, I say that such a proposition in my opinion has no solid foundation in reason to rest upon. A man's right not to work or not to pursue a particular trade or calling, or to determine when or where or with whom he will work is in law a right of C precisely the same nature and entitled to just the same protection as a man's right to trade or work. They are but examples of that wider right of which I have already spoken. That wider right embraces also the right of free speech. A man has a right to say what he pleases, to induce, to advise, to exhort, to command, provided he does not slander or deceive or commit any other of the wrongs known to the law of which speech may be the medium. Unless he is thus shown to have abused his D right, why is he to be called upon to excuse or justify himself because his words may interfere with someone else in his calling?

In the course of the argument one of your Lordships asked the learned counsel for the respondents whether, if a butler on account of a quarrel with the cook, told his master that he would quit his service if the cook remained in it, and the master preferring to keep the butler terminated his contract with the cook, the latter could maintain an action against the butler. One of the learned judges answers this question without hesitation in the affirmative. As, in his opinion, the present action would lie, I think he was logical in giving this answer. But why, I ask, was not the butler in the supposed case entitled to make his continuing in the employment conditional on the cook ceasing to be employed? And, if so, why was he not entitled to state the terms on which alone he would remain, and thus give the employer his choice? Suppose after the quarrel each of the servants made the termination of the contract with the other a condition of remaining in the master's service, and he chose to retain one of them, would this choice of his give the one parted with a good cause of action against the other? In my opinion, a man cannot be called upon to justify either act or word merely because it inter- F feres with another's trade or calling, any more than he is bound to justify or excuse his act or word under any other circumstances, unless it be shown to be in its nature wrongful, and thus to require justification. G

The notion that there may be a difference in this respect between acts affecting trade or employment and other acts seems to be largely founded on certain dicta of BOWEN, L.J., in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (3). It must be H remembered that these were obiter dicta, for the decision was that the defendants were not liable. The passage perhaps chiefly relied upon is (23 Q.B.D. at p. 613):

"Now intentionally to do that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage, and which does in fact damage, another in that other person's property or trade, is actionable if done without just cause or excuse. Such intentional action when done without just cause or excuse is what the law calls a I malicious wrong."

It will be noted that the learned judge here makes no distinction between acts which interfere with property and those which interfere with trade. For the purpose then in hand, the statement of the law may be accurate enough, but if it means that a man is bound in law to justify or excuse every wilful act which may damage another in his property or trade, then I say, with all respect, the proposition is far too wide. Everything depends on the nature of the act, and whether it is wrongful or not. Whatever may be the effect of the dicta of some of the judges in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (3), I regard it as an authority supporting the appellant's case. The defendants, owners of ships, formed an association with the object of securing to themselves exclusively a particular carrying trade. They allowed a rebate on the freights to all shippers who shipped only with members of the association, and took other steps to secure the trade for themselves. They also sent ships to ports where the plaintiffs were endeavouring to obtain cargoes, to carry at unremunerative rates in order to secure the trade for themselves. A circular was sent by an agent of the defendants reminding shippers at a particular port that shipments for London by any of the plaintiffs' steamers at any of the ports in China would exclude the firm making the shipment from participation in the returns of freight, during the whole six-monthly period in which they had been made even though the firm elsewhere might have given exclusive support to the steamers of the combination. It was held by this House [in an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants for damages for a conspiracy to injure them] that the plaintiffs had no cause of action. This, too, be it observed, though the action was in respect of a conspiracy, what was done being in pursuance of a common course of action concerted by several shipowners.

In that case the very object of the defendants was to induce shippers to contract with them, and not to contract with the plaintiffs, and thus to benefit themselves at the expense of the plaintiffs, and to injure them by preventing them from getting a share of the carrying trade. Its express object was to molest and interfere with the plaintiffs in the exercise of their trade. It was said that this was held lawful because the law sanctions acts which are done in furtherance of trade competition. I do not think the decision rests on so narrow a basis, but rather on this, that the acts by which the competition was pursued were all lawful acts, that they were acts not in themselves wrongful, but a mere exercise of the right to contract with whom, and when, and under what circumstances and upon what conditions they pleased. I am aware of no ground for saying that competition is regarded with special favour by the law; at all events, I see no reason why it should be so regarded. But if the alleged exception could be established, why is not the present case within it? What was the object of the defendant and the workmen he represented but to assist themselves in competition with the shipwrights? In my opinion, there is no difference in principle between the two cases.

For the reasons I have given, I think the judgment should be reversed, and judgment entered in the action for the defendant with costs. I have only very recently had the opportunity of knowing the views entertained by the Lord Chancellor with regard to this case. In consequence of them, I think it right to add the following observations. I am not behind my noble and learned friend in the desire to preserve individual liberty. But I think it is never in greater danger than when a tribunal is urged to restrict liberty of action because the manner in which it has been exercised in a particular instance may be distasteful. I am unable to regard as altogether accurate the statement of my noble and learned friend that up to the period when this case reached your Lordships' House there was a unanimous consensus of opinion. I think he has overlooked the following facts. When the Court of Appeal in Bowen v. Hall (10) held that an action lay for maliciously inducing another to break his contract, LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., differing from his two colleagues, was of opinion that even in such a case an action could not be maintained. When in Temperton v. Russell (33) LORD ESHER and LOPES, L.J., carried the doctrine further, and held that an action would lie for maliciously inducing another not to enter into a contract A. L. SMITH, L.J., notwithstanding the strong expression of opinion by those learned judges, significantly reserved his own opinion on the point. And when in the present case LORD ESHER and LOPES, L.J., re-affirmed the opinions they had previously pronounced, RIGBY, L.J., only concurred in the judgment under appeal in deference to the opinions expressed in the previous case. In my opinion, the conclusion at which I have arrived is not in conflict with any decision, or even with the pronounced opinions of any judges, except those enunciated in the recent cases now under review. On the contrary, I believe, with all deference to my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, that any other conclusion would run counter to principles of the common law which have been long well established. I regard the decision under appeal as one absolutely novel, only to be supported by affirming propositions far reaching in their consequences, and, in my opinion, dangerous and unsound.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am sorry to say that I must begin by recapitulating the facts of the case, for the findings of the jury, taken by themselves, do not convey to my mind any definite meaning. The jury have found that the appellant Allen “maliciously induced” the Glengall Iron Co. to discharge the respondents from their service, and they have awarded damages in consequence. I do not know what the jury meant by the word “induced”; I am not sure that I know what they meant by the word “maliciously.” Sometimes, indeed, I rather doubt whether I quite understand that unhappy expression myself. I am, therefore, compelled to turn for help to the evidence at the trial, accepting, as I suppose the jury must have accepted, the account given by the respondents in preference to that offered by the appellant wherever there may be any shadow of difference between them. [His Lordship reviewed the evidence.] On their dismissal Flood and Taylor brought this action against Allen. Each party had the financial support of their union. The plaintiffs joined as co-defendants Jackson and Knight, the chairman and secretary of the Boilermakers’ Union. Jackson and Knight had no more to do with the matter than any of your Lordships. The jury found that they did not authorise Allen in acting as he did. On further consideration the action was dismissed against them, and the dismissal was affirmed on appeal. It is not necessary for me to say anything about this part of the case, except that I cannot help thinking that the fact of the judge leaving any question to the jury as regards the chairman and secretary of the union must have rather tended to confuse the issue as between the plaintiffs and Allen. Although he pointed out that there was no evidence of conspiracy, it must, I should think, have given some colour to the suggestion of oppressive combination as an element to be considered, whereas in the course of the trial the case was, in fact, as it seems to me, reduced to a claim against Allen for what he did in his individual capacity.

Before I proceed to consider the legal grounds on which KENNEDY, J., and the Court of Appeal decided the case against Allen, I should like to ask what was wrong in Allen’s conduct. He had nothing to do with the origin of the ill-feeling against Flood and Taylor. He did nothing to increase it. He went to the dock simply because he was sent for by one of the men of his union. It seems to be considered the duty of a district delegate to listen to the grievances of the members of his union within his district, and to settle the difficulty if possible. The jury found that the settlement of this dispute was a matter within Allen’s discretion. The only way in which he could settle it was by going to see the manager. There was surely nothing wrong in that. There was nothing wrong in his telling the manager that the “iron men” would leave their work unless the two shipwrights against whom they had a grudge were dismissed, if he really believed that that was what his men intended to do. As far as their employers were concerned the “iron men” were perfectly free to leave their work for any reason, or for no reason, or even for a bad reason. Any one of them might have gone singly to the manager, or they might have gone to him all together (if they went quietly and peaceably), and told him that they would not stay any longer with Flood and Taylor at work among them. If so, it is difficult to see why fault should be found with Allen for going in their place and on their behalf, and saying what they would have said themselves.

Then, did Allen say or do anything in the course of his interview with Mr. Halkett which, in the events which have happened, gives Flood and Taylor a right of action

A against him? That brings me to the case presented to the jury. In the statement of claim there were serious allegations for which, as it turned out, there was no foundation whatever in fact. It was alleged that Allen and his co-defendants had induced the company to break contracts with the plaintiffs. That was a mistake; there was no contract to break. It was alleged that Allen and his co-defendants had conspired against the plaintiffs. That was a mistake, too; there was not, as the
B learned judge said, "a shred of evidence of any conspiracy at all." Then there was a charge of intimidation and coercion. That charge vanished too. The only reference the judge made to it was to say "there is no evidence here, of course, of anything amounting to intimidation or coercion in any legal sense of the term." The case as launched broke down. The judge however, saved two questions from the wreck, and put them to the jury. They were these: (i) Did Allen maliciously
C induce the company to discharge the plaintiffs? (ii) Did Allen maliciously induce the company not to engage the plaintiffs? In putting these questions he explained that the word maliciously was a term of art in law—a proposition, at any rate, not universally true. He said:

D "It means, connected with the word 'induce,' this—that it was not for the mere purpose of forwarding fairly Allen's own interests, but from the indirect motive of doing a mischief to the plaintiffs in their lawful business."

That comes near the ordinary meaning of "malice," if "deliberate mischief" be taken as its ordinary meaning. And it is to be observed that in the cases professedly founded on Lumley v. Gye (11)—I refer particularly to Bowen v. Hall (10), E Temperton v. Russell (33), and the present case in the Court of Appeal—the word "malice" seems to be used in a sense not far removed from its ordinary and popular signification. As regards the meaning of the word "induce," I do not think the jury got much assistance.

I rather gather from the summing-up that the jury were given to understand that if they thought that Allen merely represented the state of things as it was—and
F the feeling of the "iron men" at the Regent's Dock—they would be at liberty to answer the questions put to them about Allen in the negative. But the answer must be the other way if they thought that Allen went further, and assumed to represent the union, and to speak as if he had the power of the union at his back. That would be a threat, and would amount to "inducing." I do not think it can be said that Allen did "induce" the company to discharge the plaintiffs. Certainly
G it cannot be truly said that he procured them to be discharged. It was not his act that prevented the company from continuing to employ them. If the whole story had been a fiction and an invention on his part I could have understood the finding of the jury. But I do not think there was any misrepresentation on Allen's part; I do not think there was any exaggeration. Nor, indeed, was there any such point made at the trial. The evidence of the plaintiffs themselves proves that the "iron H men" were in a very nasty temper. They believed the "iron men" meant mischief. Allen evidently thought they were bent on striking. Edmonds, the foreman, indeed, says he thought Allen "had only to hold up his hand, and the whole of the men would go off." But he gathered this from Allen's manner, not from what he said. But, after all, whatever he may have gathered from Allen's manner, it was not Edmonds who discharged the plaintiffs. It was Mr. Halkett, and he did it without
I consulting Edmonds. Mr. Halkett says nothing to show that he was afraid of Allen. He must have known too much about trade unions to have supposed for a moment that a subordinate officer in Allen's position could have taken upon himself to call the men out. It is quite plain what it was that induced Mr. Halkett to discharge the plaintiffs. It was nothing that originated with Allen. It was no misrepresentation on his part. It was not fear of his personal influence. It was simply a very natural desire for peace and quiet. Mr. Halkett did not want the yard upset. He did not want a row between two sets of workmen which was pretty J sure to end in a strike.

So we see now, I think, what the findings of the jury come to if they are to be A treated as being in accordance with the evidence. They must mean that Allen induced the company to discharge the plaintiffs, by representing to the manager, not otherwise than in accordance with the truth, the state of feeling in the yard, and the intentions of the workmen, and that he did so "maliciously," because he must have known what the issue of his communication to the manager would be, and naturally, perhaps, he was not sorry to see an example made of persons B obnoxious to his union. But is his conduct actionable? It would be very singular if it were. No action would lie against the company for discharging the two shipwrights. No action would lie against the "iron men" for striking against them. No action would lie against the officers of the union for sanctioning such a strike. But if the respondents are right the person to answer in damages is the man who happened to be the medium of communication between the "iron men" and the C company—the most innocent of the three parties concerned, for he neither set the "agitation" on foot nor did he do anything to increase it, nor was his the order that put an end to the connection between employer and employed. It seems to me that the result would have been just the same if Edmonds had told Mr. Halkett what was going on in the yard, or if Mr. Halkett had learned it from Flood and Taylor themselves. D

Even if I am wrong in my view of the evidence and the verdict amounts to a finding that Allen's conduct was malicious in every sense of the word and that he procured the dismissal of Flood and Taylor—that is, that it was his act and conduct, and his act and conduct alone, which caused their dismissal—and if such a verdict were warranted by the evidence, I should still be of opinion that judgment was E wrongly entered for the respondents. I do not think that there is any foundation in good sense or in authority for the proposition that a person who suffers loss by reason of another doing or not doing some act which that other is entitled to do or to abstain from doing at his own will and pleasure, whatever his real motive may be, has a remedy against a third person who by persuasion or some other means, not in themselves unlawful, has brought about the act or omission from which the loss comes, even though it could be proved that such person was actuated by malice F towards the plaintiff, and that his conduct if it could be inquired into was without justification or excuse. The case may be different where the act itself to which the loss is traceable involves some breach of contract or some breach of duty, and amounts to an interference with legal rights. There the immediate agent is liable and it may well be that the person in the background who pulls the strings is G liable too, though it is not necessary in the present case to express any opinion on that point. But if the immediate agent cannot be made liable, though he knows what he is about, and what the consequences of his action will be, it is difficult to see on what principle a person less directly connected with the affair can be made responsible unless malice has the effect of converting the act not in itself illegal or improper into an actionable wrong. H

If that is the effect of malice, why is the immediate agent to escape? Above all, why is he to escape when there is no one else to blame, and no one else answerable? And yet many cases may be put of harm done out of malice without any remedy being available at law. Suppose a man takes a transfer of a debt with which he has no concern for the purpose of ruining the debtor, and then makes him bankrupt out of spite, and so intentionally causes him to lose some benefit under a will or settle- I ment; suppose a man declines to give a servant a character because he is offended with the servant for leaving; suppose a person of position takes away his custom from a country tradesman in a small village merely to injure him on account of some fancied grievance not connected with their dealings in the way of buying and selling—no one I think, would suggest that there could be any remedy at law in any of these cases. But suppose a customer, not content with taking away his own custom, says something not slanderous or otherwise actionable or even improper in itself to induce a friend not to employ the tradesman any more. Neither one nor the other is liable for taking away his own custom. Is it possible that the one can be made liable for inducing the other not to employ the person against whom he has a grudge? If so, a fashionable dressmaker might now and then, I fancy, be plaintiff in a very interesting suit. The truth is, that questions of this sort belong to the province of morals rather than to the province of law. Against spite and malice the best safeguards are to be found in self-interest and public opinion. Much more harm than good would be done by encouraging or permitting inquiries into motives when the immediate act alleged to have caused the loss for which redress is sought is in itself innocent or neutral in character and one which anybody may do or leave undone without fear of legal consequences. Such an inquisition would, I think, be intolerable, to say nothing of the probability of injustice being done by juries in a class of cases in which there would be ample room for speculation and wide scope for prejudice.

I should like to add that, in my opinion, the decision of this case can have no bearing on any case which involves the element of oppressive combination, the vice of which seems to me to depend on considerations which are conspicuously absent in the present case.

As regards authority, there is, I think, very little to be said. It is hardly necessary to go further back than Lumley v. Gye (11) in 1853. There is not much help to be found in the earlier cases that were cited at the Bar, not even I think in the great case about frightening ducks in a decoy, whatever the true explanation of that decision may be. In Lumley v. Gye (11) it was held that an action would lie for procuring a person to break a contract for personal service. The subsequent cases of Bowen v. Hall (10) and Temperton v. Russell (33) are authorities for the proposition that the principle is not confined to contracts for personal service. There is no doubt much to be said for that proposition. But the judgment under appeal does not depend on Lumley v. Gye (11) or on any decision before or after that case. It rests only on certain dicta, to be found first in Bowen v. Hall (10), and afterwards repeated in Temperton v. Russell (33). Those dicta are of great weight, owing to the eminence of the judge by whom they were pronounced, but they certainly were not necessary for the decision in either case. Lumley v. Gye (11) was heard on demurrer. The counts which were demurred to alleged that the defendant knew "the premises," that is, the existence of the contract stated in the declaration, and was "maliciously intending to injure the plaintiff," Mr. Willes, for the defendant, in reply, pointing out that malice was never averred in actions for seducing servants, argued that "the averment of malice can make no difference"; and that seems to have been the opinion of the majority of the court, who thought the action would lie. CROMPTON, J., treats the allegation of malice as meaning nothing more than the allegation of notice, and ERLE, J., indicates that the principle on which the action is to be rested is that "the procurement of the violation of the right"—that is, the plaintiff's right under the contract—"is a cause of action." If so, it would seem to follow that provided the violation is committed knowingly, it cannot matter whether the thing is done maliciously or not, and, therefore, with all deference to the opinion of BLACKBURN, J., who, if I rightly understand his words in Cattle v. Stockton Waterworks Co. (37), seems to say that "malicious intention" was the gist of the action, I should be disposed to hold that, if a right has been knowingly violated, an allegation of malice is superfluous, and that, if there has been no violation of any right, malice by itself is not a cause of action. I cannot, therefore, agree with LORD ESHER, M.R., in thinking that the act complained of was "wrongful" because it was "malicious," and that, if there be a malicious act, and loss resulting from that act, it does not matter whether there has been a violation of right or not. I am of opinion that judgment should be entered for the appellant.

LORD MORRIS.—If this was an ordinary case I should be satisfied by merely expressing my concurrence in the able and exhaustive judgment of the Lord Chancellor which deals so fully both with the law and the facts of the case, but as the decision of this House, about to be pronounced, overturns, as I consider, the overwhelming judicial opinion of England, I feel bound to state shortly my views without reiterating the common facts of the case or going into the evidence in detail, as both have already been so often repeated. The first question that would arise is: Was there not a de facto contractual relation between the Glengall Iron Co., the employers, and the plaintiffs, the employees, which would have continued but for the malicious interference of the defendant. The plaintiffs were only day labourers but with a certainty of their employment being continued de die in diem for a considerable time. In my opinion, it is actionable to disturb a man in his business by procuring the determination of a contract at will or by even preventing the formation of a contract when the motive is malicious and damage ensues. The question of actual contractual relations in this case was not dealt with, as during the course of the trial it was assumed that there was no contractual relation existing between the Glengall Iron Co. and the plaintiffs which was determined by the action of the defendant. I desire, however, to deal with the case on the finding of the jury, namely: "That the defendant did maliciously induce the Glengall Iron Co. to discharge the plaintiffs from their employment."

At common law a workman had a right to work with any person who was willing to employ him. Both had a right to trade in labour as in any other commodity and as they thought fit. This was part of the personal liberty enjoyed by every man, and, like personal liberty, was the subject of peculiar safeguards, notably—it was a right which, like that of personal liberty, could not be bartered away. A contract restraining one's right to trade, with certain exceptions not material here, was like a contract to become a slave, null and void. One right as well as the other was inalienable. The existence of this right to trade was established at least as far back as the reign of Queen Anne. In Keeble v. Hickeringill (8) it was held that an action on the case lay for discharging guns near the decoy pond of another with a design to damnify the owner by frightening away the wildfowl resorting thereto, by which the wildfowl were frightened away and the owner damnified. It is to be observed that the act of discharging the gun was per se lawful. The ground of HOLT, C.J.'s, judgment was as follows:

"Then when a man useth his art or skill to take them, to sell or dispose of for his profit, this is his trade, and he that hinders another in his trade or livelihood is liable to an action for so hindering him. . . . Now there are two sorts of acts for dong damage to a man's employment for which an action lies. The one is in respect of a man's privilege or in respect of his property. The other is where a violent or malicious act is done to a man's occupation, profession, or way of getting a livelihood. There an action lies in all cases, but if a man doth him damage by using the said employment, as if Mr. Hickeringill had set up another decoy in his own ground near the plaintiff's and that had spoiled the custom of the plaintiff no action could lie."

Why? "Because he had as much liberty to make and use a decoy as the plaintiff." These words, in my opinion, draw the distinction between an act in se legal which is rendered unlawful when done maliciously and the same act which remains lawful although it does harm to another because it was done in the exercise of the owner's right to trade and that harm resulted from trade competition. SIR W. ERLE in his work on TRADE UNIONS, p. 12, lays down the proposition thus: [HIS LORDSHIP read the passage quoted by the Lord Chancellor at p. 60, ante, and continued.]

To what extent have these opinions and the judgment in Keeble v. Hickeringill (8) been dissented from or approved of in subsequent judicial proceedings? I am not aware of any judicial expression of dissent from them, while the judgments of several of the judges in the Mogul Case (3), in the Court of Appeal and in this House, largely support them. In the admirably logical and scientific judgment of BOWEN, L.J., he says (23 Q.B.D. at p. 613):

"Intimidation, obstruction, and molestation are forbidden; so is the intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other, assuming always that there is no just cause for it."

Among several cases he cites is that of Keeble v. Hickeringill (8). He proceeds to decide in favour of the defendant upon the ground that there was a just cause or excuse for what they had done. He adds (ibid. at p. 618) :

"Such a legal justification would not exist when the act was merely done with the intention of causing temporal harm without reference to one's lawful gain or the lawful enjoyment of one's own rights. The good sense of the tribunal which had to decide would have to analyse the circumstances and to discover on which side of the line each case fell."

In this House, in the opinion of LORD BRAMWELL, which was read in his absence by LORD MACNAGHTEN, who expressed his agreement, it is stated :

"The plaintiffs do not complain of any act the ultimate object of which was to injure the plaintiffs, having its origin in malice or ill-will to them," and he refers generally without giving its name, to Keeble v. Hickeringill (8). LORD FIELD, in his opinion, said : "I think that this appeal may be decided upon the principles laid down by HOLT, C.J., in Keeble v. Hickeringill (8)." After pointing out that

"acts done by a trader in the lawful way of his business, although by the necessary results of effective competition, interfering injuriously with the trade of another are not the subject of any action."

he proceeds :

"Of course it is otherwise, as pointed out by HOLT, C.J., if the acts complained of, although done in the way or under the guise of competition or other lawful right are in themselves violent or purely malicious, or have for their ultimate object injury to another from ill-will to him and not in the pursuit of lawful rights."

In this House opinions were expressed by seven of their Lordships. Not one expressed any disapproval or adverse criticisms of Keeble v. Hickeringill (8).

If the principle of Keeble v. Hickeringill (8) is applicable to this case, as, in my opinion, it is, I fail to see how KENNEDY, J., could have withdrawn the case from the jury. In his charge he put Allen's case, as it seems to me, most favourably to the jury. He says (I merely summarise it) :

"Now, bearing in mind how Allen came, you have to consider whether the plaintiffs have proved to you, not merely that he represented to the employers what the men working in that yard would be likely to do unless they could come to some settlement, and left to the employers . . . the choice of action, and I do not think in that case you would say that was an inducement . . . that he felt himself in this position, 'I am a district delegate; in the interest alike of the doing of the employers' work as well as of the men, it is better that I should go and tell the employers what the facts are after telling the men that they are to take no hurried action,' to let the matter either be settled peaceably by the employers or if it cannot be settled by them be brought in due course before the executive of the union."

The charge of the learned judge seems to me to put the case favourably for Allen, but it appears to me that some of your Lordships have put yourselves in the place of the jury by coming to the conclusion that Allen had gone to the employers merely to intimate as has been said, or represent to them the feelings and views of the men, to be their messenger or mouthpiece, that being the very case that was negatived by the jury. Indeed, LORD JAMES, in his opinion, which I have had the advantage of reading, has gone further, for he says, "for him (Allen) to communicate such intention to the company did not injure the respondents." If this was correct there was no necessity to go any further. The plaintiffs would not have suffered damage by the act of the defendant. In my opinion, it was for the jury, the constituted tribunal in such cases, and not for your Lordships, to say whether Allen went to the employers as peacemaker, intimidator, representer, messenger, or mouthpiece, as was stated by him, or rather for him by some of your Lordships, or whether he went with the object of, and with the purpose of, having the plaintiffs punished for past alleged offences by getting them discharged at once from their employment. The defendant gave a complete denial to the substance of Mr. Halkett's evidence. The defendant did not take in his evidence the position which is now taken up for him by some of your Lordships, of being a messenger or an intimidator of what had occurred. He was conscious he had done wrong, and accordingly to try to save himself he denied altogether what Mr. Halkett had proved. The jury disbelieved him. His untruthful evidence gave colour to his conduct and action, which, in my opinion, amounted to this. He was an outsider, though he was telegraphed for by Elliott. He proceeded to threaten the employers with the withdrawal of the boiler-makers, which would be most injurious to the employer, unless the plaintiffs were dismissed at once. His object was to injure the plaintiffs and to punish them, and he had the intention of further persecuting them by not allowing them to work anywhere, which was not the wish of the men or their union. His conduct was unauthorised, and he misrepresented to the employers both the wishes of the men and their objects, and acted outside the scope of his authority as a district delegate of the union.

I, therefore, conclude by adopting as my own the last paragraph of HAWKINS, J.'s, opinion on the question propounded to the judges by your Lordships when he said :

"I think that there is an abundance of evidence fit to be left to the jury that, without excuse or justification, and not in the exercise of any privilege or in defence of any right, either of his own or the boiler-makers, the defendant has wilfully, unlawfully, unjustly, and tyrannically invaded and violated the plaintiffs' right by intimidating and coercing their employers to deprive them of their present and future employment to their injury, and the plaintiffs, therefore, are entitled to maintain this action."

I am, therefore, of opinion that the considered judgment of KENNEDY, J., which was unanimously affirmed by the Court of Appeal, should be affirmed by this House.

LORD SHAND.—I am of opinion that the judgment complained of should be reversed, and judgment entered for the defendant with costs. Certain facts have, with reference to the evidence and the verdict of the jury, been clearly established. In the first place it is clear that the plaintiffs had no contract with their employers, the Glengall Iron Co., entitling them to continuous employment. They were engaged to work by the day, entitled to leave the employment at the end of each day, and, on the other hand, subject to the risk that their employers might at any time cease to employ them further. While this was so, it is, however, to be observed that it is matter of clear inference, and indeed of some direct evidence, that the employment would have gone on for some time longer than it did if the employers had not been induced to discontinue it. It is, in my opinion, further clear that the employment was discontinued by the employers, the Glengall Iron Co., because of the representations made to them by the defendant Allen. This has, I think, been proved, and indeed has been expressly affirmed by the verdict of the jury. There is no real controversy as to the statement or representation made by the defendant which induced the employers to dispense with the plaintiffs' services. The defendant, in effect, stated that if the plaintiffs were continued as workers, even at wood work only, on the vessel then in the course of being repaired, the boilermakers then engaged at the iron work on the ship would cease work, and so put a stop to the completion of the repairs.

The learned judge was probably bound to lay down the law in the terms he used, having regard to the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal in Temperton v. Russell (33), which, in the view of RIGBY, L.J., governed the decision of this case. I confess that, even if the direction given were sound in law, as I think it was not, the facts were such as I should have thought should have precluded such a verdict being given, if these, with the assistance of the learned judge, had received the weight to which they were entitled at the hands of the jury. If anything is clear on the evidence, it seems to me to be this, that the defendant was bent, and bent exclusively, on the object of furthering the interests of those he represented in all he did, that this was his motive of action and not a desire, to use the words of the learned judge, "to do mischief to the plaintiffs in their lawful calling." The case was one of competition in labour, which, in my opinion, is in all essentials analogous to competition in trade, and the same principles must apply to it; and I ask myself what would be thought of the application of the word "malicious" to the conduct of a tradesman who induces the customer of another tradesman to cease making purchases from one with whom he had long dealt and instead to deal with him, a rival in trade. The case before the jury was, in my view, in no way different, except that in the one case there was competition in labour, in the other there would be competition in trade. Some of the learned consulted judges speak of Allen's conduct as having been caused by a desire to inflict "punishment" on the shipwrights for past acts, and indicate that, if the shipwrights had been actually working at iron work on the vessel at the time, the case would have been different. I cannot agree in any such view. "Punishment" in a wide and popular sense may possibly be used, though incorrectly, to describe the boilermakers' action; but it is quite clear that what they were resolved to do, and really did, was, while marking their sense of the injury which they thought (rightly or wrongly is not the question) the shipwrights were doing to them in trenching on their proper line of business, to take a practical measure in their own defence. Their object was to benefit themselves in their own business as working boilermakers, and to prevent a recurrence in the future of what they considered an improper invasion on their special department of work. How this could possibly be regarded as "malicious," even in any secondary sense that can reasonably be attributed to that term, I cannot see.

Again, the expression was repeatedly used in the argument, and has been also adopted by some of the learned judges, that the men, or rather their representative, Allen, had used "threats" in his communications with employers, which were represented as improper, and afforded evidence to support the view that their action was malicious. What were these threats? Simply this, that, if the plaintiffs were continued in the employment, they, the boilermakers, would leave. Threats may, like false or fraudulent representations, be of such a nature, if used, as to amount to improper and unlawful means used to induce action which may be injurious to others, causing them loss and damage, and I should not for a moment say that damages might not, in cases of such threats, be recoverable. But this can only apply to threats of violence, intimidation, obstruction, or the like—threats which may be described as menace which improperly affects freedom of action in the person who is induced to act or to refrain from acting. The boilermakers were quite entitled to resolve that they would not then or at any future time work at the same vessel, or even in the same yard, with the plaintiffs. No one can dispute their right so to resolve. They were quite entitled, having formed that resolution, to inform their employers that they had done so; indeed, I should say that the defendant Allen was only doing what was right and proper in intimating this resolution to the employers, in place of allowing the men to leave without notice to the employers, which would certainly cause them great inconvenience and loss. There was not threat of the nature of menace so as to amount to the use of illegal means to induce the employers to act, no threat to do anything beyond the exercise of their legal right. A master who warns his servant that a repetition of certain faults will result in dismissal, may be said to use a threat, but he is not only acting lawfully, but in most cases is to be commended for so doing in place of giving an instant dismissal.

In giving his opinion in the present case CAVE, J., expressed the opinion that, if a butler who, for some reason or another, has made up his mind that he will no longer continue in service with the cook, with whom he has been in the same employment, should intimate his resolution to the employer, and the services of the cook should thereupon be dispensed with, the cook will have in law a claim of damages against the butler. If this view were sound, then the plaintiffs in this case might be entitled to succeed. Indeed, I have always thought throughout the course of the argument that the case put by the learned judge is perhaps the simplest form in which the very question now under discussion could be raised. But with great deference to the opinion of the learned judge, no such claim could arise in such circumstances, because it cannot be truly said that on the part of the butler there was either an unlawful act, or unlawful means used in the doing of a lawful act. A servant is surely entitled, for any reason sufficient in his judgment, or even from caprice I should say, to resolve that he will no longer continue after the expiration of a current engagement in service with another servant in the same employment. This being unquestionable, the only limitation on his right to act is that he must not use unlawful means to induce his employer to dispense with the services of his fellow servant, and his action being lawful, and no unlawful means being used in carrying it out, the motive, even if it be personal ill-will to another, would not, in my opinion, create liability to a claim of damages.

Coming now directly to the merits of the question in controversy in the case, the argument of the plaintiffs and the reasons for the opinions of the majority of the consulted judges seem to me to fail, because, although it is no doubt true that the plaintiffs were entitled to pursue their trade as workmen "without hindrance," their right to do so was qualified by an equal right, and, indeed, the same right, on the part of the other workmen. The hindrance must not be of an unlawful character. It must not be by unlawful action. Among the rights of all workmen is the right of competition. In the like manner and to the same extent as a workman has a right to pursue his work or labour without hindrance, a trader has a right to trade without hindrance. That right is subject to the right of others to trade also, and to subject him to competition—competition which is in itself lawful, and cannot be complained of where no unlawful means (in the sense I have already explained) has been employed. The matter has been settled in so far as competition in trade is concerned by the decision of this House in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (3). I can see no reason for saying that a different principle should apply to competition in labour. In the course of such competition, and with a view to secure an advantage to himself, I can find no reason for saying that a workman is not within his legal rights in resolving that he will decline to work in the same employment with certain other persons, and in intimating that resolution to his employers.

It is further to be observed, distinguishing the case from one in which a contract might have subsisted between the plaintiffs and their employers for a definite period, or for the work, it might be on a particular ship, until the whole was completed (in which case the refusal to continue to give the work would be a breach of contract on the employers' part) that there was here no such breach of contract. The employers' act in dispensing with the services of the plaintiffs at the end of any day was a lawful act on their part. The defendant only induced them to do what they were entitled to do, and in the absence of any fraud or other unlawful means used to bring this about, the action fails. As already fully explained there was no case of malice in the ordinary sense of the term, as meaning personal ill-will, presented to the jury; but I agree with those of your Lordships who hold that, even if such a motive had existed in the mind of the defendant, this would not have created liability in damages.

On the grounds already stated, I think the defendant only exercised a legal right in intimating that the boilermakers would leave work if the plaintiffs were continued; he used no fraud or illegal means in the assertion of that right; and the exercise by a person of a legal right does not become illegal because the motive of action is improper or malicious: (Bradford Corpn. v. Pickles (24); and Mogul Steamship Co. Case (3), already cited). In the former of these cases LORD WATSON said:

“No use of property which would be legal, if due to a proper motive, can become illegal because it is prompted by a motive which is improper or even malicious.”

It seems to me, with reference also to the decision in the latter case, bearing on the rights of competitors in trade, that on the same principle it may be affirmed that the exercise of any legal right in the course of competition in labour or in trade does not become illegal because it is prompted by a motive which is improper or even malicious.

Both LORD HERSCHELL and LORD MACNAGHTEN have reserved their opinions as to the law applicable to a case in which the ground of action is that the defendant had induced an employer to commit a breach of contract, as in Lumley v. Gye (11), Bowen v. Hall (10), and the first branch of Temperton v. Russell (33). I desire also to reserve my opinion as to that case. The person who has committed a breach of contract is of course liable in damages in consequence. If it has not yet been decided by this House that a third party who had, without the use of fraud or other unlawful means, induced the contracting party to break his contract himself thereby incurs liability in damages, the question seems to me worthy of full discussion and consideration. The proper and usual application of the maxim qui facit per alium facit per se in cases in which a wrongful act has been performed is to hold the person who has committed the wrong, i.e., in the case supposed the person who has broken his contract, liable although his act has been done through another acting for him, and it is at least open to consideration whether the maxim would apply to one who is not himself the wrongdoer, committing a breach of contract, but only persuades or induces another to do so. The case was not presented by the learned judge to the jury as one of conspiracy, and does not raise any question of that kind. Combination of different persons in pursuit of a legitimate trade object occurred in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (3), and was there held to be lawful. Combination for no such object but in pursuit really of a malicious purpose to ruin or injure another would, I should say, be clearly unlawful, but this case raises no such question.

As to the older authorities referred to in the argument I agree in the views of LORD HERSCHELL and LORD WATSON, and I agree in thinking with them and with LORD MACNAGHTEN that Lumley v. Gye (11) was not decided on any question of malice. It was urged by the counsel for the respondents that a disapproval of the law laid down in Temperton v. Russell (33) and repeated in this case will be attended with dangerous consequences as extending the power of trades unions or combinations beyond limits which these cases laid down, and I am not insensible to the truth of the observation that a certain amount of restraint which these cases introduced will be removed. But if that measure of restraint was not founded, as I believe it was not, on sound legal principle, it is only right that by legal decision in this court of last resort it should be removed. And if the force of combination should be harshly or oppressively used—if it should be used in circumstances in which right-minded men would deplore its use—it must be observed that those against whom combination is so employed have precisely the same liberty of action for resisting oppressive measures, and for causing those who use them to desist from that course of action.

LORD DAVEY.—In this case the jury have found (i) that the defendant Allen maliciously induced the Glengall Iron Co. to discharge the plaintiffs from their employment; (ii) that the defendant Allen maliciously induced the company not to engage the plaintiffs; and (iii) that damages to the extent of £20 to each plaintiff was thereby suffered by the plaintiffs. The learned judge directed the jury that there was no evidence of any breach of contract involved in the plaintiffs being discharged by the company; that there was not a shred of evidence of any conspiracy at all, and that there was no evidence of anything amounting to intimidation or coercion in any legal sense of the term. No exception has been taken, or, in my opinion, could be taken, to these directions. We must, therefore, take the finding of the jury to mean that the company were “induced” by the persuasion and representations of Allen to discharge the plaintiffs, i.e., not to continue to employ them. The sense in which “maliciously” was intended to be used in the verdict is shown by the passage in the summing-up which has already been read and commented on by your Lordships, to be the popular sense of intending to do a mischief to the respondents.

The main question which has been argued before your Lordships was whether the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment on the findings of the jury. The learned judge in his judgment, on further consideration after verdict, followed the decision of the Court of Appeal in Temperton v. Russell (33), and gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The Court of Appeal affirmed that decision. LORD ESHER, M.R., considered that Temperton v. Russell (33) was an authority binding on that court, that a thing which you may lawfully do to the injury of another if you do it without malice, is made unlawful and gives him a right of action if you do it with malice. The learned Lord gave additional reasons for his decision, in the course of which he laid down that, whether the advice is to break a contract or not to make a contract, it has just the same effect, and that, if you give advice to one not to make a contract with intent of doing an injury to the person who is going to make the contract with him, then the malice is something which makes what would have been a lawful thing without malice, unlawful. LOPES, L.J., also said that he could see no distinction between inducing a party to a contract to break it and inducing a party to discharge a servant, as in the present case. RIGBY, L.J., simply followed Temperton v. Russell (33).

I have stated the views expressed by the Court of Appeal at some length, because they exactly express the points on which I am constrained to differ from them. The proposition of those learned judges, when analysed, seems to me to amount to this: that damnum absque injuria, if accompanied by malicious intent, will give a right of action, or that a malicious motive per se amounts, or may in certain circumstances amount, to injuria. I am unable to assent to either of these propositions. BAYLEY, J., in the well-known case of Bromage v. Prosser said (4 B. & C. at p. 247):

“Malice in common acceptation means ill-will against a person; but in its legal sense it means a wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse.”

If so, it seems to be an argument in a circle to say that an act not otherwise wrongful becomes so if malicious. Nor can I agree that there is no legal difference between persuasion to break a contract and persuasion not to enter into a contract. In the former case if the persuasion is successful the other party is deprived of the benefit of having his contract completed. In the latter case he loses nothing to which he has a legal right, and he has no legal ground of complaint against the person who refuses to contract with him. In the one case there is a violation of right; in the other case there is not. I accept for the present purpose without comment the doctrine laid down in Lumley v. Gye (11) and Bowen v. Hall (10), that maliciously to induce one to break a contract of exclusive personal service with an employer to the injury of that employer is actionable. But a perusal of the judgments delivered by the learned judges in Lumley v. Gye (11) shows that, in their opinion at any rate, it was vital to the plaintiff's case that there was a subsisting contract of service. An employer may discharge a workman (with whom he has no contract), or may refuse to employ one from the most mistaken, capricious, malicious, or morally reprehensible motives that can be conceived; but the workman has no right of action against him. It seems to me strange to say that the principal who does the act is under no liability, but the accessory who has advised him to do so without any wrongful act is under liability. To persuade a person to do or abstain from doing what that person is entitled at his own will to do or abstain from doing is lawful and in some cases meritorious, although the result of the advice may be damage to another.

This is not a case of conspiracy. I do not say whether, if it were, it would or would not make an essential difference. But I do say that I am not aware of any authority binding on this House for holding, and it humbly appears to me to be against sound principle to hold, that the additional ingredient of malice should give a right of action against an individual for an act which, if done without malice, would not be wrongful, although it results in damage to a third person. The case of libel on a privileged occasion is, of course, altogether different. A libel is held to be excused if the words complained of were used on a privileged occasion. But that excuse may be rebutted by proof of express malice and abuse of the privilege. In my opinion, the somewhat anomalous action for malicious prosecution is based on the same principle. From motives of public policy the law gives protection to persons prosecuting, even where there is no reasonable or probable cause for the prosecution. But, if the person abuses his privilege for the indulgence of his personal spite, he loses the protection and is liable to an action, not for the malice, but for the wrong done in subjecting another to the annoyance and expense of a causeless prosecution. It was, however, argued that the act of the appellant in the present case was a violation of the right which every man has to pursue a lawful trade and calling, and that the violation of this right is actionable. I remark in passing that, if this be so, the right of action must be independent of the question of malice except in the legal sense. The right which a man has to pursue his trade or calling is qualified by the legal right of others to do the same, and compete with him though to his damage; and it is obvious that a general abstract right of this character stands on a different footing from such a private particular right as the right to performance of a contract into which one has entered.

A man has no right to be employed by any particular employer, and has no right to any particular employment if it depends on the will of another. But is there any such general cause of action irrespective of the means employed or mode of interference? I think it unnecessary to comment on all the cases which have been cited by counsel, and are referred to by the learned judges. I have read them carefully, and I am satisfied that in no one of them was anything decided which is an authority for the abstract proposition maintained. In every one of them you find there was either violence or the threat of violence, obstruction of the highway or the access to the plaintiff's premises, nuisance, or other unlawful acts done to the damage of the plaintiff. Nor does it appear to me that the gist of the action in those cases was that the plaintiff was a trader, or exercised a profitable calling. That circumstance no doubt afforded evidence of the damage. But I suppose that, if a person obstructed the access to my house or to my vessel by molesting and firing guns at persons resorting thither on their lawful occasions, I may have my action against him, though I do not keep a school or I am not a trader, but sailing in my yacht for my own pleasure. Or, if a person obstructs my free use of the highway, and I suffer damage thereby, I have a right of action, though my carriage does not ply for hire, but is used only for my own purposes. It is strange that, if there be any such right of action for interference with trade, there is not to be found some clear authority in the law books in its favour. And, as remarked by one of the learned judges, if those who argued and those who decided Lumley v. Gye (11) had been aware of any such general doctrine, it would have disposed of that case without the elaborate consideration to be found in the judgments. I do not think that the well-known action for slander of a trader's goods supports the larger proposition attempted to be founded on it. BLACKSTONE treats that action as a particular example of slanderous words. And it appears to me an obvious fallacy to argue from the existence of some recognised and well-known cause of action to a larger and wider legal proposition of which the cause of action in question might be treated as a particular case if the larger proposition had been generally recognised. A B

The authority most relied on in support of the proposition maintained by the respondents is the well-known case of Keeble v. Hickeringill (8), or, more properly, the dicta of LORD HOLT as reported in 11 EAST, 574, n. That case was an action by the owner of a decoy pond against the defendant for driving away his wildfowl by firing guns with intent to damnify the plaintiff. It appears to have been twice argued, and there are four separate reports of it, which do not altogether agree as to the grounds of the judgment. But I think it was decided on the ground that the act of the defendant was a wilful disturbance of the enjoyment by the plaintiff of his own land for a lawful and profitable purpose, and what is called in law a nuisance. The reported cases in which the case has been followed (Carrington v. Taylor (7) and Ibottson v. Peat (38)) support this view. If this be a correct view of the decision, it is no authority for the larger proposition founded on it by the respondents; and the dicta of LORD HOLT, however much entitled to respect, are inadequate to support the weight which it is sought to place upon them. C D

Another point was made at your Lordships' Bar. It was contended that Allen was guilty of wilful misrepresentation in what he told Halkett; that the men never really intended to strike; and that Allen knowingly exceeded his instructions or what the men had authorised him to say when he said that they would do so. This is a question of fact to be determined on the evidence, and it might and should have been submitted to the jury. In my view, such a state of facts amounting to a charge of fraud would have constituted a legal wrong, and have been of the essence of the action. The point should, therefore, in my opinion, have been pleaded. But it is not to be found in the pleadings, and I cannot find a trace of its having been taken at the trial. No reference to such a question is to be found in the very full summing-up of the learned judge. So far as I can understand, the contention of counsel for the respondents at the trial was the exact contrary, as they were then endeavouring to recover against the other defendants, the representatives of the union. It is not the practice of your Lordships, where there has been a trial by jury, to allow a new issue or question to be raised at the Bar, which might and ought to have been, but was not, submitted to the jury for their consideration on the evidence. To do so would be to usurp the function of the jury. I do not, therefore, find it necessary to express any opinion on the point. I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and the action dismissed with the usual consequences. E F G H

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD (read by LORD SHAND).—The respondents brought their action against the appellant and others, the cause of action in the fifth paragraph of the claim being thus alleged :

“The defendant has maliciously and wrongfully, and with intent to injure the plaintiffs, intimidated and coerced the Glengall Co. to break their contracts with the plaintiffs to the plaintiffs' damage, and has further intimidated and coerced the Glengall Co. and others not to enter into new contracts with the plaintiffs, whereby the plaintiffs have suffered damage.” I

It was admitted during the trial that the first head of this claim could not be supported, for the Glengall Co. broke no contract. The question, therefore, is confined within the second alleged cause of action. Thus your Lordships have to determine whether there was sufficient evidence given at the trial to support the allegation that the appellant "intimidated and coerced the Glengall Company" not to employ the respondents. Secondly, it is advisable to consider whether in any view of the appellant's conduct there was evidence to support a cause of action.

Looking at the facts, I come to the conclusion that the appellant cannot be said to have intimidated or coerced (within the legal meaning to be given to those words) the Glengall Co. It is true he informed the company's representative of the existing intention of the boilermakers; but that intention to discontinue work if the respondents were further employed was not formed in consequence of any words or act of the appellant. He had learnt that that intention was formed by the boilermakers before his arrival at the ship. For him to communicate such intention to the company did not injure the respondents. The boilermakers would have acted upon it whether the company knew or were ignorant of their resolution. For they were about to desert their work when the appellant prevented them from doing so, and prevailed upon them to give him an opportunity of communicating with the representatives of the company. For myself I believe that the appellant communicated only the boilermakers' pre-formed intention; but even if he said that the union would call out the boilermakers if the respondents were further employed, I presume he was only communicating that which he knew would be the fact, and he was, therefore, warning the company's representatives not to pursue a course which would be detrimental to the company's interest. The appellant doubtless desired that the boilermakers' view of their claim, that they alone should execute iron work, should prevail, and, therefore, that steps should be taken to secure to them the success of that claim; and so naturally he would use solicitation and persuasion to the company's representatives with the intention of procuring the non-employment of the respondents.

So it appears to me that the question for your Lordships' decision is thus resolved: Is it actionable for A. to solicit and persuade B. not to enter into a contract with C.? Before dealing with the answers that ought to be given to this question, it is worthy of observation that there were three actors in the events leading to the non-employment of the respondents: (i) The boilermakers who refused to work with them; (ii) the appellant who communicated that refusal to the Glengall Co.; and (iii) the representatives of the company, who in consequence of the expressed intention of the boilermakers determined not further to employ the respondents. In all substance the injury inflicted upon the respondents proceeded in the first degree from the action of the boilermakers, and in the second from the action of the company in yielding to the demand of the boilermakers. That the appellant took part in the transaction is true, but he played but a very minor part, and if he had never appeared on the scene at all the injury to the respondents would have been the same, for the company would equally have exercised their option and would have refused to employ the respondents in order to secure the services of the boilermakers.

Under the circumstances it seems strange that it is not alleged that any action lies against the boilermakers, and that it should be distinctly admitted that no cause of action can be maintained against the company. If the principles laid down in the judgment of LORD ESHER, M.R., in Bowen v. Hall (10) and in Temperton v. Russell (33) were applied to the ordinary affairs of life, great inconvenience as well as injustice would ensue. Every competitor for a contract who alleged that he was the best person to fulfil it would be liable to an action. Take the case of an architect who seeks to be employed to the exclusion of his rivals. He says, "My plans are the best, and following them will produce the best house at the least cost. Therefore, employ me and not A. or B." If he be so employed the architect would, according to the dicta in Bowen v. Hall (10) be liable to an action at the suit of his rivals, for he has induced a person not to enter into a contract with a third person, and his object clearly was to benefit himself at the expense of such third person. Indeed, if the opinion delivered by CAVE, J., that it is actionable for the cook to say to her master: "Discharge the butler or I will leave you" is correct, in that case the ingredient of "being desirous to benefit herself at the expense of a third person" is wanting. For the objection of the cook might well proceed from a motive which would not represent any gain to herself. A

But I am aware that it was urged at the Bar that, even if the views which I have expressed to your Lordships be correct, there is an exception from general principles in favour of those whose trade or employment has been interfered with. I do not assent to this view. Before discussing the question it is necessary that some definition of the words "interfered with" in their legal sense should be given. Every man's business is liable to be "interfered with" by the action of another, and yet no action lies for such interference. Competition represents "interference", and yet it is in the interest of the community that it should exist. A new invention utterly ousting an old trade would certainly "interfere with" it. If, too, this loose language is to be held to represent a legal definition of liability, very grave consequences would follow. Of course the conduct of the boilermakers in the case before your Lordships amounted to an interference with the plaintiffs' business, and yet, as has been pointed out, it is not said that an action lies against them. Every organiser of a strike, in order to obtain higher wages, "interferes with" the employer carrying on his business; also every member of an employers' federation who persuades his co-employer to lock out his workmen must "interfere with" those workmen. Yet I do not think it will be argued that an action can be maintained in either case on account of such interference. But, whatever meaning may be attached to the words "interfere with," I see no ground for saying that any different rule should be applied to cases of interference with a man when carrying on his trade or business or when he is engaged in any other pursuit. In Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (3) there was an extreme case of interference with the plaintiffs' business by methods which directly injured the plaintiffs in their trade for the express purpose of benefiting the defendants. The admitted interference was carried on by several defendants in a combination which in one sense amounted to a conspiracy, yet it was held by this House that no action could be maintained, for the acts done were not unlawful and the combination was not a criminal conspiracy. I abstain from passing in review the older cases which refer to the interference with trade or business, for they have already been very fully reviewed and dealt with. B C D E F

I content myself with saying that I do not think that they establish more than that interference which is in itself unlawful constitutes a cause of action. It seems somewhat contrary to common sense that an interference which is rightful when applied to general subjects becomes wrongful when a trade or business is subjected to it. For these reasons I have, after some hesitation, come to the conclusion that, inasmuch as the appellant has used no unlawful means to produce a result, and that as the result produced represents nothing that is unlawful, this action cannot be maintained. I therefore think that the decision of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and that judgment should be entered for the appellant. G H

It is right that the court should jealously watch the exercise by public undertakings which carry on business for their own profit of byelaws which they are empowered to make, but when the court is called on to consider the byelaws of public representative bodies like county councils the matter should be approached from a different standpoint. Such byelaws ought to be supported if possible. They ought to be benevolently interpreted, and credit ought to be given to those who have to administer them that they will be reasonably administered. Courts of justice should be slow to condemn as invalid any byelaws made by local authorities on the ground of supposed unreasonableness. As to what is unreasonableness, it would be the duty of the court to condemn a byelaw as invalid and ultra vires because it was unreasonable if, e.g., they found it to be partial and unequal in its operation as between different classes or manifestly unjust, or to disclose bad faith or involve such oppressive or gratuitous interference with the rights of those subject to it as could find no justification in the minds of reasonable men, but a byelaw is unreasonable merely because a judge thinks that it goes further than is prudent or necessary or convenient, or because it is not accompanied by a qualification or an exception which he thinks ought to be there. In matters which directly and mainly concern the people of the county who have the right to choose those whom they think best to represent them on their local government bodies such representatives may be trusted to understand their own requirements better than judges.

A county council, under s. 16 of the Local Government Act, 1888, made a byelaw which provided: "No person shall sound or play upon any musical or noisy instrument or sing in any public place or highway within fifty yards of any dwelling-house after being required by any constable or by an inmate of such house personally or by his or her servant to desist."

Held by LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., CHITTY, L.J., WRIGHT, J., DARLING, J., and CHANNELL, J., MATHEW, J., dissenting: although the provisions of the byelaw were not confined to cases where the playing and singing in fact caused annoyance and it was left to the discretion of a police constable whether or not to put it into operation the byelaw was not invalid as being unreasonable or ultra vires.

Local Authority—Byelaw—Nature and scope of byelaw.

Per LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.: A byelaw of the class which we are here considering I take to be an ordinance affecting the public or some portion of the public, imposed by some authority clothed with statutory powers ordering something to be done or not to be done and accompanied by some sanction or penalty for its non-observance. It necessarily involves restrictions of liberty of action by persons who come under its operation as to acts which, but for the byelaw, they would be free to do or not to do, as they pleased. If validly made, it has the force of law within the sphere of its legitimate operation.

Case Stated by justices for the county of Kent.

The respondent, Police Superintendent Johnson, preferred an information against the appellant Kruse for that he on Sunday, Oct. 17, 1897, in the parish of Leeds, in Kent, did sing in a certain highway within fifty yards of a dwelling-house, after being required by a constable of the county to desist, contrary to a byelaw made by the Kent County Council under s. 16 of the Local Government Act, 1888. The justices convicted the appellant and fined him 40s. The byelaw under which the information was preferred was as follows :

“4. No person shall sound or play upon any musical or noisy instrument or sing in any public place or highway within fifty yards of any dwelling-house after being required by any constable or by an inmate of such house personally or by his or her servant to desist.”

It was proved to the satisfaction of the justices at the hearing that the appellant was conducting an open-air religious service at about 5.45 p.m., and with others congregated within fifty yards of a dwelling-house, and commenced to sing a hymn, in which those with him joined. After singing two or three lines of the hymn he was requested by a constable to desist, but he continued singing. The occupier of the house had not personally requested the appellant to desist on the day in question, but he had complained to the police about it on previous occasions, and the justices consequently found that the singing had caused him annoyance. It was contended on the part of the appellant that the byelaw was invalid on the grounds: (a) That it was unreasonable; (b) that it was not limited to cases of persons playing noisy instruments or singing to the annoyance of residents or passengers; (c) that it created a new offence and was repugnant to the general law of the land. The justices were of opinion that the byelaw was good and had been infringed, and they convicted the appellant.

By the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 182 [see now s. 250 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1933, and s. 32 (3) of the Interpretation Act, 1889] :

“All byelaws made by a local authority under and for the purposes of this Act shall be under their common seal; and any such byelaw may be altered or repealed by a subsequent byelaw made pursuant to the provisions of this Act, provided that no byelaw made under this Act by a local authority shall be of any effect if repugnant to the laws of England or to the provisions of this Act.”

By s. 184 [see Act of 1933, s. 249 (2), s. 250 (3), (5), (6)]

“Byelaws made by a local authority under this Act or for purposes same as or similar to those of this Act under any local Act, shall not take effect unless and until they have been submitted to and confirmed by the Local Government Board [now Minister of Housing and Local Government], which Board is hereby empowered to allow or disallow the same as it may think proper; nor shall any such byelaws be confirmed unless notice of intention to apply for confirmation of the same has been given in one or more of the local newspapers circulated within the district to which such byelaw relates one month at least before the making of such application, and unless for one month at least before any such application a copy of the proposed byelaws has been kept at the office of the local authority, and has been open during office hours thereat to the inspection of the ratepayers of the district to which such byelaws relate without fee or reward. The clerk of the local authority shall, on the application of any such ratepayer, furnish him with a copy of such proposed byelaws or any part thereof on payment of sixpence for every hundred words contained in such copy. A byelaw required to be confirmed by the Local Government Board shall not require confirmation, allowance, or approval by any other authority.”

By Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 23 [see now the Act of 1933, s. 249 (1), A s. 251] :

"The council may from time to time make such byelaws as to them seem meet for the good rule and government of the borough, and for the prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner by virtue of any Act in force throughout the borough, and may thereby appoint such fines, not exceeding in any case £5, as they deem necessary for the prevention and suppression of offences against the same. Such a byelaw shall not be made unless at least two-thirds of the whole number of the council are present. Such a byelaw shall not come into force until the expiration of forty days after a copy thereof has been fixed on the town hall. Such a byelaw shall not come into force until the expiration of forty days after a copy thereof, sealed with the corporate seal, has been sent to the Secretary of State, and if within those forty days the Queen, with the advice of her Privy Council, disallows the byelaw or part thereof, the byelaw or part disallowed shall not come into force; but it shall be lawful for the Queen at any time within those forty days to enlarge the time within which the byelaw shall not come into force, and in that case the byelaw shall not come into force until after the expiration of that enlarged time."

By the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 16 [see now the Act of 1933, s. 249 (1)] :

"A county council shall have the same power of making byelaws in relation to their county, or to any specified part or parts thereof as a council of a borough have of making byelaws in relation to their borough under s. 23 of the Municipal Corporation Act, 1882, and s. 187 of the Public Health Act, 1875, shall apply to such byelaws."

May 14, 1898. The following judgments were read.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J. The county council of Kent, claiming to act under their statutory powers, made the following byelaw :

"4. Playing musical instruments, etc.—No person shall sound or play upon any musical or noisy instrument or sing in any public place or highway within fifty yards of any dwelling-house after being required by any constable or by an inmate of such house personally or by his or her servant to desist."

The appellant was summoned before the magistrates for offending against this byelaw, when it was proved that on Oct. 17, 1897, he persisted in singing in a public highway within fifty yards of a dwelling-house after having been required by a police constable to desist. It was further proved by the occupier of the dwelling-house that the singing of the appellant and those with him was an annoyance to such occupier. The occupier had not, on the day in question, set the constable in motion, but he had on previous occasions complained to the police of the appellant's singing. The magistrates convicted the appellant, and against that conviction the present appeal is brought. The question reserved for this court is whether the byelaw is valid. If valid the conviction is to stand. It is objected that the byelaw is ultra vires on the ground that it is unreasonable, and, therefore, bad. It is necessary, therefore, to see what is the authority under which the byelaw in question has been made, and what are the relations between its framers and those affected by it.

But first it seems necessary to consider what is a byelaw. A byelaw of the class we are here considering I take to be an ordinance affecting the public or some portion of the public, imposed by some authority clothed with statutory powers

A ordering something to be done or not to be done and accompanied by some sanction or penalty for its non-observance. It necessarily involves restriction of liberty of action by persons who come under its operation as to acts which, but for the byelaw, they would be free to do or not to do, as they pleased. Further, it involves this consequence—that, if validly made, it has the force of law within the sphere of its legitimate operation: see Edmonds v. Watermen and Lightermen Co. (Master and Senior Warden) (1).

B In the present case we are dealing with a byelaw made by a local representative body, namely, the county council of Kent, which is created under the Local Government Act, 1888, and is endowed with the powers of making byelaws given to municipal corporate bodies under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. Section 16 of the Local Government Act, 1888, provides that a county council shall have the same power of making byelaws in relation to their county as the council of a borough have in relation to their borough; and it further provides that s. 187 of the Public Health Act, 1875, shall apply to such byelaws. I will take these statutes in the order of time. Section 182 of the Act of 1875 provides that all byelaws made by a local authority under that Act shall be under their common seal and may be altered or repealed by a subsequent byelaw, but no byelaw shall be repugnant to the laws of England or to the provisions of the Act. Section 183 gives power to impose penalties. Section 184 provides that byelaws shall not take effect until confirmed by the Local Government Board, which may allow or disallow them, and, before their confirmation, notice of intention to apply for confirmation must be advertised, and for a month at least before such application a copy of the proposed byelaws must have been kept at the office of the local authority for the inspection of ratepayers, and the clerk of the local authority is bound to furnish on application a copy of the proposed byelaws, or a part of them, to any ratepayer on certain payment being made. [See now Act of 1933, s. 249 (2), (3), s. 250 (3), (4), (6).] Section 23 of the Act of 1882 provides that the council of a borough may from time to time make such byelaws as to them seem meet for the good rule and government of the borough, and for the prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner; and they may, by such byelaws, appoint such fines, not exceeding £5, as they deem necessary for the prevention of offences against the byelaws. It is under this authority that the byelaw in question was framed.

F What are the checks or safeguards under which this very wide authority of making byelaws is exercisable? The same section (23) [repealed] further provides that no byelaw can be made unless two-thirds of the whole number of the council are present, and, when so made, it shall not come into force until the expiration of forty days after a copy thereof has been fixed on the town hall, and it shall not come into force until the expiration of forty days after a copy sealed with the corporate seal has been sent to the Secretary of State, and if, within those forty days the Queen, with the advice of her Privy Council, disallows a proposed byelaw or part thereof, such byelaw or such part shall not come into force, and the Queen may within the forty days enlarge the time within which the byelaw shall not come into force.

H We thus find that Parliament has thought fit to delegate to representative public bodies in towns and cities, and also in counties, the power of exercising their own judgment as to what are the byelaws which to them seem proper to be made for good rule and government in their own localities. But that power is accompanied by certain safeguards; there must be antecedent publication of the byelaw with a view, I presume, of eliciting the public opinion of the locality upon it, and such byelaws shall have no force until after they have been forwarded to the Secretary of State. Further, the Queen, with the advice of her Privy Council, may disallow the byelaw wholly or in part, and may enlarge the suspensory period before it comes into operation. I agree that the presence of these safeguards in no way relieves the court of the responsibility of inquiring into the validity of byelaws where they are brought in question, or in any way affects the authority of the court in the determination of their validity or invalidity. It is to be observed, moreover, that byelaws, having come into force, are not like the laws, or what were said to be the laws, of the Medes and Persians—they are not unchangeable. The power is to make byelaws from time to time as to the authority shall seem meet, and, if experience shows that in any respect existing byelaws work hardly or inconveniently, the local authority, acted upon by public opinion, as it must necessarily be, of those concerned, has full power to repeal or alter them. It need hardly be added that, should experience warrant that course, the legislature which has given may modify or take away the powers they have delegated. A

I have thought it well to deal with these points in some detail, and for this reason, that the great majority of the cases in which the question of byelaws has been discussed are not cases of byelaws of bodies of a public representative character intrusted by Parliament with delegated authority, but are for the most part cases of railway companies, dock companies, or other like companies which carry on their business for their own profit, although incidentally for the advantage of the public. In this class of case it is right that the courts should jealously watch the exercise of these powers and guard against their unnecessary or unreasonable exercise to the public disadvantage. But when the court is called upon to consider the byelaws of public representative bodies clothed with the ample authority which I have described, and exercising that authority accompanied by the checks and safeguards which have been mentioned, I think the consideration of such byelaws ought to be approached from a different standpoint. They ought to be supported if possible. They ought to be, as has been said, “benevolently” interpreted, and credit ought to be given to those who have to administer them that they will be reasonably administered. This involves the introduction of no new canon of construction. But, further, looking to the character of the body legislating under the delegated authority of Parliament, to the subject-matter of such legislation, and to the nature and extent of the authority given to deal with matters which concern them, and in the manner which to them shall seem meet, I think courts of justice ought to be slow to condemn as invalid any byelaws so made under such conditions on the ground of supposed unreasonableness. C
F

Notwithstanding what COCKBURN, C.J., said in Bailey v. Williamson (2)—an analogous case—I do not mean to say that there may not be cases in which it would be the duty of the court to condemn byelaws made under such authority as these were made as invalid because unreasonable. But unreasonable in what sense? If, for instance, they were found to be partial and unequal in their operation as between different classes, if they were manifestly unjust, if they disclosed bad faith, if they involved such oppressive or gratuitous interference with the rights of those subject to them as could find no justification in the minds of reasonable men, the court might well say Parliament never intended to give authority to make such rules, and that they are unreasonable and ultra vires. But it is in this sense, and in this sense only, as I conceive, that the question of unreasonableness can properly be regarded. A byelaw is not unreasonable merely because particular judges may think that it goes further than is prudent or necessary or convenient, or because it is not accompanied by a qualification or an exception which some judges may think ought to be there. Surely, it is not too much to say that, in matters which directly and mainly concern the people of the county who have the right to choose those whom they think best fitted to represent them on their local government bodies, such representatives may be trusted to understand their own requirements better than judges. Indeed, if the question of the validity of byelaws were to be determined by the opinion of judges as to what was reasonable—in the narrow sense of that word—the cases in the books on this subject are no guide, for they reveal, as, indeed, one would expect, wide diversity of judicial opinion, and they lay down no principle or definite standard by which reasonableness or unreasonableness may be tested. G

A So much for the general considerations which it seems to me ought to be borne in mind in considering byelaws of this class. I now come to the byelaw in question. It is admitted that the county council of Kent were within their authority in making a byelaw in relation to the subject-matter which is dealt with by the impeached byelaw. In other words, it is conceded—and properly so—that the local authority might make a byelaw imposing conditions under which musical instruments and singing might be permitted or prevented in public places. But it is objected that they have no authority to make a byelaw on that subject in the terms of this byelaw. Further, it is not contended that the byelaw should, in order to be valid, be confined to cases where the playing or singing amounted to a nuisance, but the objections are, as I understand them, that the byelaw is bad—first, because it is not confined to cases where the playing or singing is in fact causing annoyance, and next because it enables a police-constable to bring it into operation by a request on his part to the player or singer to desist.

C As to the first of these objections, if the general principles upon which these byelaws ought to be dealt with are those which I have already stated, it is clear that the absence of this qualification cannot make the byelaw invalid. But, further, such a qualification, in my judgment, would render the byelaw ineffective. What is to be the standard of annoyance? What may be a cause of annoyance to one person may be no annoyance, and may even be pleasurable, to another person. Again, who is to be the judge in such a case of whether there is or is not an annoyance? Is it to be the resident of the house within fifty yards of the playing or singing, or is it to be the magistrate who hears the charge? It is enough to say that, in my judgment, the absence of the suggested qualification cannot make the byelaw invalid, even if it be admitted that its presence would be an improvement.

As to the second objection—namely, that the policeman has the power of putting the byelaw into operation by requiring the player or singer to desist—I again say that, even if the absence of this power would be an improvement and would make the byelaw in the apprehension of some more reasonable, it is not on the principles I have already stated any ground for declaring the byelaw to be invalid. In support of this objection pictures have in argument been drawn (more or less highly coloured) of policemen who, without rhyme or reason, would or might gratuitously interfere with what might be a source of enjoyment to many. In answer, I say a policeman is not an irresponsible person without check or control; if he acts capriciously or vexatiously he can be checked by his immediate superiors, or he can be taught a lesson by the magistrates should he prefer vexatious charges. If the policeman persisted in saying that the musician should desist when the people in the neighbourhood desire his music, his gratuitous interference would promptly come to an end. Nor is it correct to say (as has been erroneously stated in some of the cases cited) that the magistrate would be bound in every case to convict where the musician did not desist when called upon. It is clear that, under s. 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, the magistrate, if he thinks the case of so trifling a nature that it is inexpedient to inflict any punishment, may without proceeding to conviction dismiss the information [see now Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 3 (1), s. 7 (1)]. The facts of this case are certainly no illustration of the byelaw having been gratuitously or vexatiously put in force. The Case states that, although it was not proved that the occupier of the house within fifty yards had on the day in question requested the constable to require the appellant to desist, yet it was proved that the singing was an annoyance to the occupier, and that he had on previous occasions complained to the police of such singing. Indeed, it was stated during the argument that the conviction here appealed from was the second conviction of the appellant for an offence against this byelaw.

I have carefully read the cases cited in argument, but I do not propose to consider them in detail. Many of them relate to byelaws made under different statutes; others it is difficult to reconcile; few deal with the principles upon which byelaws like those in question are to be dealt with by the courts; and some of them—as, for instance, Munro v. Watson (3) and perhaps Johnson v. Croydon Corpn. (4) A may be distinguished from the present case. In weighing previous authorities it is further to be recollected that the cases have come before Divisional Courts, usually consisting of two members, and that those cases, being in their nature criminal, there has been no judgment of a Court of Appeal upon them. It is for this reason that the present special court has been constituted. I cannot doubt that this court B has authority to review, and if it thinks fit to differ from, any prior decision of a Divisional Court on this subject: see Fortescue v. St. Matthew, Bethnal Green, Vestry (5).

I have said that there are few of the prior cases dealing with this matter which lay down the principles upon which the byelaws made by representative public bodies are to be considered. There is one notable exception; I refer to Slattery v. C Naylor (6). That was a case in the Privy Council, in which the members of that court had to consider the validity of a byelaw passed by the municipal council of the borough of Petersham, in New South Wales, under the provisions of the Municipalities Act, 1867. The court consisted of LORDS HOBHOUSE, HERSCHELL, and MACNAGHTEN and SIR BARNES PEACOCK and SIR RICHARD COUCH. That case has been so fully discussed during the course of the argument that I do not think it necessary here to refer to it in detail. It is enough to say that, beyond doubt, D the reasoning and principles on which it proceeds fully justify the views which I have expressed in this judgment. Nor are the weight and value of the reasoning in that case, as an authority in the present case, in any way lessened by the fact that the byelaw there was made under the authority of a different statute. The cases are strictly analogous, and it was necessary for the judgment of the Privy E Council that that tribunal should consider the principles upon which byelaws of representative governing bodies should be considered. That it has done thoroughly and clearly.

In my opinion, judged by the test of reasonableness, even in its narrower sense, this is a reasonable byelaw; but, whether I am right or wrong in this view, I am clearly of opinion that no court of law can properly say that it is invalid. In the F result, the conviction appealed from must be affirmed, but, as the question is one of wide importance, as to which there has been a contrariety of judicial opinion, it will be affirmed without costs.

SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P.—The byelaw the validity of which is in question on this appeal, in effect, makes it an offence to perform music or singing in a G public place or highway within fifty yards of a dwelling-house if an inmate of such house, or if a police constable require the performer to desist. The provisions as to the inmate and as to the police constable give rise to somewhat different considerations. The sole question is, whether this court should hold that in its judgment, this byelaw is invalid because it is unreasonable.

I agree with the contention urged before us that it is material to consider by what H authority the byelaw was made. It was made by the county council of Kent, that is to say, a public representative body to which Parliament has confided the duty of making byelaws for the good rule and government of the inhabitants of Kent and the prevention of nuisances in that county. Three considerations appear to me to apply with especial force to such an authority dealing with such a subject-matter. First, the case is wholly different from that of manorial authorities, or of I trading corporations such as dock or railway companies, who often have a pecuniary interest in their byelaws, or even of such a municipal corporation as might be supposed to have trade interests involved. Secondly, such an authority as a county council must be credited with adequate knowledge of the locality, its wants and wishes; and thirdly, the opportunity afforded by legislation for a request for reconsideration, and an appeal to higher authorities by members of the public shows that any byelaw that comes into force has secured at least the acquiescence of those whom it affects. Cases may be imagined in which, in spite of these considerations, this court, acting in the discharge of its undoubted powers and duty, might feel compelled to hold a byelaw made by a county council invalid on the ground that it was unreasonable. But when a question of the requirements and wishes of the locality is involved, this court should, I think, be very slow to set aside the conclusions of the local authority. If support be needed for this opinion, it is to be found in the language of the Privy Council in Slattery v. Naylor (6), an appeal which came from a colony to which the settlers carried the law of England, and which was very fully considered by a Board of high authority. I will quote only one of the many passages that might be referred to (13 App. Cas. at p. 452) :

“The jurisdiction of testing byelaws by their reasonableness was originally applied in such cases as those of manorial bodies, towns, or corporations having inherent powers or powers conferred by charter of making such laws. As new corporations or local administrative bodies have arisen the same jurisdiction has been exercised over them. But, in determining whether or not a byelaw is reasonable, it is material to consider the relation of its framers to the locality affected by it, and the authority by which it is sanctioned.”

The main ground of objection taken to this byelaw is, as I understand it, that it does not require proof that annoyance has in this particular instance been caused by the musical performance complained of. It is undoubtedly true that in several cases it has been held by this court that the absence of a provision that annoyance or nuisance must be shown renders the byelaw unreasonable, but such cases appear to me to be distinguishable from the present. In Johnson v. Croydon Corpn. (4) it was held that a byelaw prohibiting in effect music other than military music in the streets of the borough on Sunday was unreasonable on the ground, as I understand it, that it did not require evidence of annoyance being caused. It is obvious that, for aught contained in such a byelaw, a musical performance subject to condemnation under it might have taken place on a spot where no one could be annoyed, or in a manner to which no one felt any objection. But it is not necessary that a requirement of evidence of actual annoyance should be prescribed in terms. It is enough if the circumstances render annoyance certain or even probable. For example, it has been held that a byelaw forbidding the keeping of pigs within a hundred feet from a dwelling-house in a populous place is reasonable : Wanstead Local Board v. Wooster (7). Slattery v. Naylor (6), where it was held reasonable to prohibit burials within a hundred yards of public buildings, dwelling-houses, or public roads, is another illustration of the same principle.

These were instances of matters by which anyone affected would presumably be annoyed. But a musical performance in a street is not a thing in its nature certain to annoy anyone. It is only an annoyance if someone who hears it thinks it is one to him. In the byelaw before us it is accordingly provided that an offence is committed only if the performance takes place within fifty yards of a dwelling-house, and has been objected to by an inmate of such house. I will deal with the provision as to the constable presently. To my mind, this insistence on the place of the performance and on the objection being taken by an inhabitant affected may be considered to supply the element which, in the cases I have referred to, appeared to this court to have been wanting. People who live in public streets must submit to the primary purposes for which those streets exist. They must put up with frequent annoyances of traffic, and occasional annoyances from the opening of roads for repair, for the supply of gas, water, or electricity, or from building operations in their vicinity. But street music is not a primary purpose of a street. It may be harmless if no one who lives there objects to it, it may be even acceptable to the locality; but, if an inhabitant affected entertains and signifies an objection, I do not think that this court should consider that a county council, in giving him a veto upon it, pursues an unreasonable course.

The byelaw provides in the alternative that a police constable may require the performance to desist. Whether this be an unreasonable provision, appears to me to depend on the view taken as to the probable action of a police constable in such a matter. If it is thought that he will act harshly, and without fair ground of public order or comfort, it would be unreasonable to vest him with such discretion. But if it be believed that he will act either in assistance of an inhabitant entitled to object, but who does not wish to be involved in a not improbable altercation, or because he sees that public order is concerned, it is not unreasonable that he should be intrusted to exercise a discretion on the requirements of the case. Which of these two views is to be taken seems to me precisely a matter on which the judgment of the county councillors is entitled to be respected, especially as probably most of them are magistrates. I for one cannot pretend to know whether a Kent policeman may be trusted to do his duty fairly and properly, as well as I have no doubt they do. Alty v. Farrell (8), which was cited to us as an authority against the reasonableness of conferring on policemen such powers as are given in the present case, appears to turn on the powers of the borough under the Act in question, to delegate their authority to all constables instead of to persons specially appointed to execute the provisions of the Act. Further, it is not to be forgotten that an important safeguard is provided by the legislature against the exceptional caprice of an inhabitant, or abuse of discretion by a policeman, because s. 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, enables a magistrate to dismiss an information if he thinks that the charge, though proved, was, in the particular case, of a trifling nature. I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that this conviction should be affirmed, but without costs.

MATHEW, J.—The byelaw in question has been made under the Local Government Act, 1888, with which were incorporated certain provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. By one of the incorporated sections, namely, s. 23 of the Act of 1882, the county council were enabled to make such byelaws as to them seemed meet for the good rule and government of the district under their jurisdiction, and for the prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner. By the same section, in accordance with the usual practice where statutory powers to make byelaws are conferred, certain formalities were directed to be observed before the local enactments came into operation. These formalities, it was admitted, had been complied with, and the first question which presented itself was whether the byelaw in question had been thereby legalised.

By reciting the Ordinances of Corporations Act, 1503, a previous Act which had been allowed to expire, it was provided that no masters, wardens, and fellowships of crafts or mysteries, nor any rulers of guilds or fraternities, should take upon them to make or to execute any acts or ordinances by them theretofore made in disheritance or diminution of the prerogative of the Crown, or of others, nor against the common profit of the people; but that the same acts or ordinances should be examined and approved by the Chancellor, Treasurer of England, or Chief Justices of both benches, or three of them, or before both the justices of assize in their circuit or progress in that shire where such acts or ordinances were made, on pain of forfeiting £40 for every time that they should do to the contrary. It was decided in very early times that the approval of the byelaw by the authorities mentioned in the statute did not give it validity, if not otherwise legal: Ipswich Taylors' Case (9); Stationers' Co. v. Salisbury (10); 2 KYD ON CORPORATIONS, 109. The validity of the byelaws must be determined by the judges when they are properly brought before them. This duty has been cast on the superior courts when any restriction is sought to be imposed on personal liberty and is traceable to the clause in the Great Charter: "Nullus liber homo disseisiatur de . . . libertatibus suis . . . nisi . . . per legem terræ. . ." This rule has been followed and acted upon down to the present time.

The power to make byelaws is conferred upon a vast number of corporate bodies and associations created by charter, or by statute, as e.g., municipal bodies, companies for trading and other purposes, literary and scientific associations, and such institutions as the University of London and the College of Surgeons: see for further instances LUMLEY ON BYELAWS, at p. 164. From the many decisions upon the subject it would seem clear that a byelaw to be valid must, among other conditions, have two properties: it must be certain—that is, it must contain adequate information as to the duties of those who are to obey—and it must be reasonable: see City of London Case (11); Com. Dig. Byelaw B. 1; Framework-Knitters' Co. v. Green (12); Eagleton v. East India Co. (13). The byelaw in question was, so far as is material to my judgment, in the following form:—

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the byelaw in the present case was not reasonable and was not certain. It forebade without qualification of any kind conduct which might be perfectly innocent and unobjectionable. It did not provide, as had been done in similar enactments, and in the county council's byelaw No. 3, that the act prohibited should be an annoyance to anyone. It contained no exception, and would, according to its terms, condemn all music and singing within fifty yards of a dwelling-house as in the nature of a nuisance. The right to prohibit was conferred on any policeman. Why should liberty of conduct, it was asked, be so interfered with? A policeman has no such authority in the metropolis. Why should a policeman in the country be entrusted with powers so easily abused?

For the respondent it was argued that the byelaw was well enough. It had been framed by a representative body created under recent legislation, whose regulations should be indulgently treated. It must be taken, it was said, that Parliament intended that local authorities should be upheld, and to this end that new canons of construction should be adopted by the courts to preserve their byelaws from being declared invalid. It was no longer enough to point out that a byelaw according to its terms was unreasonable; it should be upheld if it might be reasonably enforced, and it was no longer an objection that it might be unreasonably enforced. It was urged that there were adequate safeguards for the public which, though not expressed, ought to be implied. It was true that any policeman might prohibit acts of which no reasonable man ought to complain; but it was said that confidence might be reposed in the discretion of the policeman, and that he would not be likely to interfere unreasonably. This seems to me too generous a view of the qualifications of the ordinary constable. There was said to be a further safeguard—viz., that the county council would not sanction interference by the police unless there was some good cause. But a byelaw once made could not and ought not to be controlled in its operation by the members of the council. Further, it was argued that the policeman who interfered without good cause would be reprimanded by his superiors, or a magistrate would probably refuse to issue a summons. These suggestions implied that there would be cases in which a constable ought not to have the power to prohibit or to prosecute. It seems to me that the public ought to be informed in clear language what these cases were. It would not be satisfactory to a person, who was innocent of any real offence and was summoned as a criminal, to have an apology offered to him on the ground that the policeman had been wanting in discretion. Again, it was said that a magistrate would have power to refuse to convict in a trifling case, under s. 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, but the byelaw affords no security that this power would be exercised. A magistrate might reasonably consider that he was bound to convict, for a byelaw once duly published became part of the law of the land in the locality to which it applies. It should be remembered that this law has been made for the purpose of securing the good rule and government of the district. It would appear not to be well calculated in its present form to secure any such result. The interference of a policeman which the byelaw permits would not be unlikely, it seems to me, to produce angry altercation, and to lead to a breach of the peace.

I do not propose to refer at length to the cases cited in the argument, where byelaws made under local authority have in recent times been condemned as unreasonable. In none of those cases is there any indication of the principle which I understand to be now contended for, namely, that such ordinances should receive a special kind of interpretation. The powers conferred on county councils have been spoken of in the discussion as something previously unknown to the law; but, from the earliest times when charters were granted to towns, municipal affairs have been managed by elected representatives of the inhabitants. The byelaws made by such bodies have frequently been declared invalid. Take, for instance, the byelaws which have been held to be unreasonable restraints of trade, and which are referred to in the judgment in Mitchel v. Reynolds (14). No case has been cited in which there is any trace of the principle now contended for, that such byelaws are to be interpreted with any particular indulgence because of their popular origin. If this view be adopted, it seems to me that the judges will be placed in an anomalous position. Where they differ from bodies not popularly elected, their jurisdiction to pronounce upon the validity of a byelaw would remain unimpaired; but, where they differed from bodies like a county council, their position would be altogether different. They would be bound to uphold what in other cases they would be right in condemning. I concur in the view that deference should be shown by the courts to the byelaws of a local authority which might appear to interfere unduly with personal liberty, where there was reason to suppose that the regulations were called for by the requirements of the particular place. There may be peculiar circumstances in the condition of a borough or part of a county which make stringent regulations as to personal conduct necessary. In that sense I agree that a byelaw ought to receive an indulgent interpretation. But this byelaw is not confined to a particular locality; it applies to the whole of rural Kent.

It seems to me that what we are asked to do in this case is not to interpret the byelaw, but to frame a new enactment with the necessary safeguards for freedom of conduct. It is practically proposed that we should add a proviso to the byelaw as it stands to the effect that it ought not to be unnecessarily or unreasonably enforced. This I consider that we have no power to do. The only authority relied on for the novel principle contended for by the respondent was the judgment of the Privy Council in Slattery v. Naylor (6). In that case a byelaw had been made by a local authority in New South Wales for regulating interments in cemeteries. Under its provisions interments in a particular place had been prohibited. The court held that the byelaw was valid. It is difficult to see how any doubt could have existed on the subject. This decision was sufficient to dispose of the case, but it would seem that an argument had been addressed to the court that the compliance with the statutory requisites required by the colonial law, had been sufficient to render the byelaw valid, and I gather that this view was favourably entertained by their Lordships. The argument was that the byelaw was legalised by force of s. 158 of the colonial Act, under which it had been made, and which provided that all byelaws consistent with the provisions of the Act, and not repugnant to any other Act or law in force in the colony, should have the force of law when confirmed by the governor and published in the Government Gazette. It seems to me clear that the case is only an authority on colonial law, and I do not find in the judgment any indication of an intention to pronounce an opinion upon the decisions of our courts, which declare what has been understood to be the law of England upon this subject.

I have been unable to find any authority in any of our books for the suggestion that the validity of a byelaw can be established in any other way than by the judgment in a court of law as to its meaning according to the ordinary rules of construction. In my judgment, this byelaw should be amended. It came into operation on May 19, 1897, and the offence with which it deals is, therefore, of very recent creation. As it stands, any constable may prohibit any singing on any highway within fifty yards of a dwelling-house in any part of the county of Kent, except such parts as are within a municipal borough. It has been suggested that the real intent of the council was to prevent noisy demonstrations which would be offensive to residents within their jurisdiction. If this were so, it becomes difficult to understand why this intention was not stated in plain terms, and why the language should be so wide of the mark. It seems to me to be of special importance, where the aid of constables is invoked to maintain order, that the duties of the police, on the one hand, and the obligations of the public, on the other, should be stated with reasonable clearness. Laxity in the preparation of local enactments is not to be encouraged. I regret to be unable to concur in the view of the majority of my colleagues. Their judgment appears to me to conflict with the recent decisions referred to in the course of the discussion, and with the views expressed by SIR HENRY HAWKINS, the late CAVE, J., the present Master of the Rolls, and the late KAY, L.J. In Alty v. Farrell (8), a byelaw which gave a policeman an unqualified right to require a vendor of coal in small quantities to weigh the coal in the policeman's presence was held to be unreasonable and invalid, because the power might be exercised oppressively. This principle seems to me applicable in the present case. The decision in Alty v. Farrell (8) has the high authority of the Lord Chief Justice and WRIGHT, J. The judgments of the majority of the judges by whom this case is decided will no doubt be entitled to great respect from those who may have similar cases to deal with, but the decision will not be binding on any other Divisional Court, and in the present state of the law there seems to be no mode of finally settling the difference of judicial opinion that may arise in cases like the present. A change of procedure would seem to be necessary which would permit an appeal in the ordinary way. I am of opinion that this conviction should be quashed.

WRIGHT, DARLING, and CHANNELL, JJ., concurred in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice.

If an act is manifestly unlawful, or the doer of it knows it to be unlawful, as constituting either a civil wrong or a criminal offence, he cannot maintain an action for contribution regarding, or for indemnity against, the liability which results to him therefrom. But where a person has been induced by the fraudulent misrepresentation of another to do an act, indifferent in itself, which turns out to be unlawful because it constitutes either a private wrong or a criminal offence, but which was not at the time apparently unlawful and was done in honest ignorance of the circumstances which constituted its unlawfulness, the person doing the act is entitled to maintain an action against the person making the misrepresentation for damages in respect of the damage suffered by him through his commission of the unlawful act.

A statement of claim alleged that the defendants, having secretly determined to invade the territory of a friendly State with a hostile armed force, by various false and fraudulent representations and by falsely representing that the expedition was a lawful one and had the sanction and licence of the Crown, induced the plaintiff to take part in the expedition, and that the plaintiff, relying upon these representations of the defendants and believing that the expedition was a lawful one, took part in the same and thereby received severe injuries and suffered damage.

Held: the statement of claim disclosed a cause of action to which it was no answer for the defendants to say that the expedition was a criminal venture as being in breach of s. 11 (1) of the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, and the plaintiff, having taken part in the commission of that offence, was disentitled to recover.

Point of Law raised on the pleadings as to whether the statement of claim disclosed any cause of action.

The statement of claim stated that the British South Africa Co. was a British company incorporated by royal charter, dated Oct. 29, 1889, for trading and other purposes, with powers of government and other powers as mentioned in the charter, and having for the principal field of its operations a defined region of South Africa. The defendant Rhodes was at all times material to this action a director of the company, and was entrusted with the management of all its property and affairs in South Africa. The defendant Jameson was an officer and agent of the company, and was entrusted with the control of the forces of the company which were employed in the invasion hereinafter mentioned. In or about the month of September, 1894, the plaintiff was employed by the company to serve for a year in the armed forces of the company within the territorial limits prescribed for the company by the charter, and he entered upon and remained continuously in such employment from the time of his engagement until after the happening of the matters hereinafter complained of. In the month of September, 1895 (when the plaintiff was at Buluwayo and his period of service was about to expire), the defendants having secretly determined to invade the territory of the South African Republic with a hostile armed force, in order to induce the plaintiff to renew his engagement and take part in such invasion as a member of the force, fraudulently represented to the plaintiff that the detachment in which he was serving was about to be employed in active service and that it would be to his benefit, and they requested him to continue in the service of the company. The defendants intended the plaintiff to believe, and he did believe, that the service on which the detachment was about to be employed was of a lawful nature, and, relying on the aforesaid representations, the plaintiff agreed to and did continue in the said company's service for a further period. The representations, it was alleged, were to the knowledge of the defendants untrue. Shortly after the plaintiff had entered into the above agreement the defendants caused a considerable number of the troops in the employment of the company (including the detachment in which the plaintiff was serving) to be concentrated at or near Pitsani under the control of the defendant Jameson for the purpose of the invasion. On Dec. 29, 1895, the defendants, for the purpose of the invasion and in order to induce the plaintiff to take part therein and to enter the territory of the republic as a member of the company's armed forces, fraudulently represented to the plaintiff that fighting was about to commence in or near Johannesburg, that protection was needed for the women and children there, that a body of the Rhodesian Horse would meet and co-operate within the territory of the republic with the troops with which the plaintiff was serving, that a body of Cape Mounted Rifles (forces of Her Majesty) was also waiting near the frontier of the republic to join and co-operate with the said troops, and that the proposed invasion had the sanction and support of Her Majesty's government. These representations, it was said, were to the knowledge of the defendants untrue.

The plaintiff complained that, he believing the aforesaid representations to be true, and relying thereupon, was induced thereby to enter the territory of the South African Republic as a member of the company's armed forces and to engage in hostilities with the troops of the Republic, and that by reason of the matters aforesaid the plaintiff suffered great injury and was subjected to severe hardship and imminent dangers. The troops of the company with which he was serving were defeated by the forces of the republic at Doornkop, and in the battle which was fought there the plaintiff was severely wounded and lost a leg and subsequently had to undergo seven surgical operations. He was taken and kept prisoner by the authorities of the republic, and was liable to summary execution at their hands. Hospital accommodation was refused him, and he was left lying exposed in the street at Pretoria. He was also rendered liable to severe punishment in England for offences against the laws of England, and was brought to England as a prisoner. He was caused much pain and suffering, and his health and capacity for earning his livelihood were and always would be greatly impaired. The plaintiff set out as particulars of special damage: Loss of kit (£25); loss of pay for first eight months of 1896 (£120); loss of earnings from Sept. 1, 1896 to Nov. 1, 1898, at £200 a year (£433 6s. 8d.), and loss of leg; and he claimed £3,000 damages.

By para. 11 of the defence the defendants submitted that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action.

By s. 11 of the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870:

"If any person within the limits of Her Majesty's Dominions, and without the licence of Her Majesty—Prepares or fits out any naval or military expedition to proceed against the Dominions of any friendly State, the following consequences shall ensue: (1) Every person engaged in such preparation or fitting out, or assisting therein, or employed in any capacity in such expedition, shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment, or either of such punishments, at the discretion of the court before which the offender is convicted; and imprisonment, if awarded, may be either with or without hard labour. (2) All ships, and their equipments, and all arms and munitions of war, used in or forming part of such expedition, shall be forfeited to Her Majesty."

Mar. 20, 1899. The following judgments were read.

GRANTHAM, J.—In this case we are asked to determine whether on the statement of claim as presented to us (or with such amendments, if any, as may be necessary to raise the question of law desired to be determined) any cause of action has been shown for which an action is maintainable according to English law. For the purposes of our judgment, this being a demurrer by the defendants, all the facts alleged in the claim must be taken to be true and admitted by the defendants.

What, therefore, are those facts? Shortly these. That the defendants, having secretly determined to invade the territory of a friendly Power with a hostile armed force, they, for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to enter their service as an armed servant, deceived the plaintiff as to their intentions, told him that the service on which they wished to employ him was lawful, that, as fighting would shortly take place in the said South African Republic between other forces, his services were required for the protection of women and children, that the force of which he was a member would have the support of other lawfully appointed forces, and that such invasion of the territory of the South African Republic had the sanction and support of Her Majesty's government, whereas, in fact, all the aforesaid representations were untrue to the knowledge of the defendants. Acting on and believing in these statements, the plaintiff entered the service of the defendants, and in obeying their orders received the injuries and suffered the losses complained of, for which he seeks to recover damages in this action. It is difficult to realise any period of our history in which a defendant making such fraudulent statements and inflicting such serious injury would not be liable for the consequences of his fraud, and yet it has been solemnly argued that such is the law at the present time.

Let us see, therefore, on what grounds the learned counsel for the defendants attempts to support his contention that this statement of claim discloses no good cause of action. He does not rely on a possible assumption that the damages resulted from a voluntary enlistment of the plaintiff on a warlike expedition for the pay and the prospective advantages likely to accrue to him, and were not in any way caused or aggravated by the fraud; but he admits that his contention rests solely on the assumption that the plaintiff, innocent of all knowledge of wrong on his part, did by obeying the order of the defendants in fact become a criminal himself, and could not therefore complain of any wrong done him by the defendants who were participes criminis with him. But how does he show that he is a criminal? He relies on the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, s. 11 (1) [ante p. 120]. The defendants contend, therefore, that, it being immaterial whether the person employed in such expedition had a mens rea or guilty knowledge of the nature of his act or not, and, though the plaintiff believed, as he did, that his action had the sanction of the Queen's government, yet he was just as much a criminal as the defendants who had knowingly broken the law, and that, once the plaintiff was proved a criminal, he could not, according to the defendants, be heard to complain of the original and deeper dyed fraud of the defendants, which had placed the plaintiff, unwittingly on his part, in a position which made him liable to be called a criminal. A grosser perversion of English justice it is impossible to imagine, and I should indeed be sorry if under any circumstances it could be proved to be English law. It must not be forgotten that the plaintiff has not been proved to be a criminal in any court of law. He has not been tried, much less convicted, and never will be tried, and, therefore, cannot be convicted, and under the circumstances a jury would, I doubt not, acquit him if he was now tried; but, till he has been convicted, how can the defendants be heard to say that, as in their opinion the plaintiff's conduct was an infringement of the Act, he must be treated as if he had been convicted of being a criminal by Act of Parliament?

Let us look, therefore, at the authorities relied upon by counsel for the defendants to see what aid, if any, they give him in his contention. First, he relies on the dictum of LORD MANSFIELD in Holman v. Johnson (1), wherein he says (1 Cowp. at p. 343):

"the objection that a contract is immoral or illegal as between plaintiff and defendant sounds at all times very ill in the mouth of the defendant. But it is not for his sake that the objection is allowed. . . . No court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause of action upon an immoral or an illegal act. If from the plaintiff's own stating or otherwise the cause of action appears to arise ex turpi causa, there the court says he has no right to be assisted. . . . So if the plaintiff and defendant were to change sides the latter would have the advantage of it, for where both are equally in fault potior est conditio defentis."

It seems to me that no stronger authority could be quoted against the defendants. The plaintiff's cause of action is not founded, as far as he is concerned, on any immoral or illegal consideration, but, as the defendants rely on their own immorality and illegality, it does sound very ill in their mouths to endeavour to rob the plaintiff of his rights by their (the defendants') illegality; and as in these proceedings the defendants have changed places with the plaintiff and are practically plaintiffs, as they are claiming a judgment on their demurrer, I am only echoing LORD MANSFIELD in saying I will not allow the plaintiffs to rely on their illegality to obtain a judgment against the defendant, for potior est conditio defendentis, and, the demurrer being dismissed the present plaintiffs' right of action is admitted. A

The next case counsel for the defendants relied on was Colburn v. Patmore (2). This case, when it is carefully examined, seems to me to help the defendants less even than the last. The only matter under discussion in that case was whether the plaintiff, the printer and owner of a paper, having been convicted of a criminal libel and fined £100, could recover that sum from the defendant, the editor of the paper, whom he alleged to have first inserted the libel contrary to his duty to the plaintiff and so induced the plaintiff to publish it. It was held he could not recover it because he had not shown that he had not himself approved of the libel before printing and publishing it himself. But even taking the obiter dicta of the learned judge as law in the passage where (quoting from LORD LYNTHURST's judgment) LORD LYNTHURST says (1 Cr. M. & R. at p. 83): B C

"I know of no case in which a person who has committed an act declared by the law to be criminal has been permitted to recover compensation against a person who has acted jointly with him in the commission of the crime." D

Quite true. But what compensation can he not recover? Why, compensation for the damage he has incurred by proceedings having been taken against him for the commission by him of the wrongful act complained of. As MR. MAULE (afterwards MAULE, J.) said during the argument: E

"The question is whether a person convicted of a criminal offence can claim an indemnity from another who has participated with him in the commission of that offence,"

i.e., indemnity for the damages recovered against him for the commission of the offence. In this case the plaintiff, in the first place, has been convicted of no offence, and, in the second place, is not seeking to recover an indemnity for damages recovered against him, but is seeking to recover damages for a wrong done to him, in which he did not participate except as a sufferer and in which it cannot be said he was a particeps criminis. When the false and fraudulent representation was made which was the causa causans of this action, no crime had been committed by the defendants, much less by the plaintiff, and as far as the plaintiff knew no crime had been committed by the defendants at any time up to the happening of the events which caused the damage to the plaintiff, for if the invasion had the sanction and authority of Her Majesty or her government, as the defendants alleged, there was no breach of any statute for which the plaintiff or the defendants could be made liable. F G

Counsel for the defendants relies next on Merryweather v. Nixan (3), in which it was held that one wrongdoer cannot have redress or contribution against another. True, it was so held; but what does BEST, C.J., say about it in delivering the judgment of the court in Adamson v. Jarvis (4)? He says (4 Bing. at pp. 72-73): H

"From the concluding part of the judgment in Merryweather v. Nixan (3), and from reason, justice, and sound policy, the rule that wrongdoers cannot have redress or contribution against each other is confined to cases where the person seeking redress must be presumed to have known that he was doing an unlawful act." I

Again, in Palmer v. Wick and Pulteneytown Steam Shipping Co. (5), the noble Lords, though not overruling Merryweather v. Nixan (3), damn the case with faint praise, decline in terms to apply it to Scotland, and refuse to extend its operation one iota. As the action of the plaintiff is only made a criminal act by statute, and is not inherently a criminal act, the plaintiff cannot be presumed to have known of his guilt until he has been proved to have been guilty.

As the expedition in question is alleged to have been something in the nature of a highway robbery, I am surprised that the defendants did not refer to Everet v. Williams (6), mentioned in LINDLEY ON PARTNERSHIP (6th Edn.), p. 101 [9th Edn., p. 124, n.], which it was said was a suit by one highwayman against another for an account of their plunder, the bill alleging that the plaintiff was skilled in dealing in several commodities, such as plate, rings, watches, purses, etc., and that the defendant applied to him to become a partner, and that, after dealing together at several places, such as Bagshot, Hampstead, Salisbury, etc., they differed as to their respective shares, and so the suit in Chancery was instituted for an account. The bill was dismissed with costs because it was held that they were both participes criminis, and so the plaintiff could not recover. Perhaps it may be that the learned counsel were afraid to refer us to this case lest the same results should happen—viz., that the counsel who signed the bill was made to pay the costs of the bill, and the solicitors were fined £50, and the plaintiff and defendant were both hanged.

As the defendants have failed to establish their case, it is hardly necessary to refer to any authorities on the other side, and I will only mention Campbell v. Campbell (7) (7 Cl. & Fin. at p. 181), where one partner in a distillery had been convicted of illegal transactions and made liable to penalties, and he was held entitled to recover against his co-partner contribution for those penalties, notwithstanding the authority of Colburn v. Patmore (2), before referred to, because (as LORD COTTENHAM said) he was not participes criminis in the sense which would disentitle him to sue for contribution. If, in such a case, he could recover, how much more so when the cause of action is not one for indemnity for damages given against him for the commission of the alleged illegal act, but is for damage for the alleged fraud on the part of the defendants in putting the plaintiff into such a position as caused him personal injury and loss quite irrespective of any illegal complicity in a crime. It is true the plaintiff also refers in his statement of claim to the liability the defendants had made him incur to severe punishment in England for offences against the English law, but he never was made liable to punishment, he never was made a criminal, and he suffered no damage from that liability, and I, therefore, treat that part of the statement of claim as struck out, as no damages are really claimed under that head.

As the defendants have entirely failed to refer us to any authority that, in my judgment, justifies their contention that the plaintiff's declaration discloses no good cause of action for which he can sue, I am glad to be able to say that our law has been purged from the suggestion that fraud and false representation injurious to an innocent person can be committed with impunity if the injured person has by such fraud and false representation been unwittingly and innocently made to commit what the law has said shall be called a crime. For these reasons, in my judgment, the demurrer must be dismissed with costs.

KENNEDY, J.—The plaintiff in this action seeks to recover damages from the defendants on the ground that they induced him by false and fraudulent representations to renew an engagement of service with the British South Africa Co., and to take part in the well-known expedition which was led by the defendant Jameson into the Transvaal in December, 1895, in consequence whereof he was damnified in various ways which are set forth in the statement of claim. In the statement of claim the plaintiff alleges, among other things, that by reason of the premises he was rendered liable to severe punishment in England for offences against the laws of England. The defendants have pleaded that the statement of claim discloses no cause of action, their point being that the paragraph which I have just quoted, puts the plaintiff out of court. It is an admission that the plaintiff's participation in the expedition constituted a criminal offence under s. 11 of the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, and the defendants' argument is that no action can be maintained to recover damages for having been induced to commit a crime. It is upon the correctness of this contention that the court is called upon to adjudicate, as if the point had been raised by a demurrer under the old common law practice. A

I have come to the conclusion, for reasons which I will state, that the defendants' contention ought not to prevail. It has, I think, long been settled law that, if an act is manifestly unlawful, or the doer of it knows it to be unlawful, as constituting either a civil wrong or a criminal offence, he cannot maintain an action for contribution or for indemnity against the liability which results to him therefrom. An express promise of indemnity to him for the commission of such an act is void. In Shackell v. Rosier (8), where, in consideration that the plaintiff had published a libel at the defendant's request and had at the like request consented to defend an action brought against the plaintiff for such publication, the defendant promised to indemnify the plaintiff from the costs of the action, the Court of Common Pleas held that the promise could not be enforced. In the preceding year—1835—in the American case of Arnold v. Clifford (9), STORY, J., held that a promise to indemnify another for doing a private wrong or for committing a public crime is against public policy and void at law: see also Martyn v. Blithman (10), which is cited in the note to Farebrother v. Ansley (11), 1 Camp. at p. 348. Where the circumstances constituting the unlawfulness of the act are known to the doer of it, his inability to obtain contribution or indemnity appears to me to be clear. In the next place it is, I think, also clear that an action for indemnity, grounded either on deceit or warranty, may be maintained where the party who seeks the indemnity has incurred damage by reason of his having been authorised or (as is alleged in this action) fraudulently induced by another to do an act, indifferent in itself, which has turned out to be unlawful because it constitutes a private wrong, but which was not at the time apparently unlawful and was done in honest ignorance of the particular circumstances which constituted its unlawfulness: see the judgment of BEST, C.J., in Adamson v. Jarvis (4); Betts v. Gibbins (12); Dixon v. Fawcus (13); and POLLOCK ON THE LAW OF TORTS (5th Edn.), p. 171. In such a case an express promise to indemnify is valid in law: Fletcher v. Harcot (14). B C D E

I come now to the question which was very fully argued before us in the present case, namely: Does this right of indemnity which exists in the case of a wrong done by misadventure, when the wrong is a private wrong, exist also in any case in which the wrong is a criminal offence? The defendants contend that it does not. They say that in no case whatever where the act constitutes a criminal offence can the doer of it have a right of indemnity against any of the consequences of the act. It appears to me that this proposition of the defendants is wider and more general than the law warrants. Certainly there is no right of indemnity where the doer of the act which another has authorised or induced knows it at the time to be an offence. If upon the face of his claim for indemnity, in a case in which knowledge is an essential ingredient of the offence, the plaintiff admitted that he was guilty of the offence his claim would be, on the face of it, bad. If in the like case he was on the trial proved to have been convicted of the offence, judgment must be given against him. Nor, in my judgment, can there be any valid claim to indemnity when the doer of the act which constitutes the offence, has done it with knowledge of all the circumstances necessary to constitute the act an offence, but in ignorance that the act done under those circumstances constituted an offence. A man is presumed to know the law. Thirdly, although it is not necessary to decide the point, I am inclined to think that there could be no claim to indemnity for being authorised or induced to do an act where the act, which is in fact criminal, is done in ignorance, indeed, of some circumstance which is necessary to constitute a crime, or even is done in a belief that such circumstance does not exist, but the doer knows that the act is morally a wrong act. In such a case the doer of the act has the mens rea in the sense attributed to that expression of BRAMWELL, B., in the well-known case of R. v. Prince (15) (L.R. 2 C.C.R. at p. 173 et seq.), referred to by WILLS, J., in R. v. Tolson (16) (23 Q.B.D. at p. 180). Such a case might, I think, occur, although it is not likely to occur often. F G H I J

But I am unable to accept the defendants' proposition where the act, though a criminal offence—malum prohibitum—is, upon the state of facts which the doer, by the fraudulent misrepresentation of the person against whom he claims indemnity, has been induced to believe to be the true state of facts, neither criminal nor immoral. Take the present case as an example. For the purposes of the argument of the point before us, the facts must be assumed to be as the plaintiff alleges them to be. It must, therefore, be assumed that he was rendered liable to be convicted of an offence under s. 11 of the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870. It must also be assumed—in regard to the construction of that section—for the purposes of the present argument, that a man may be convicted of an offence under it if he assists or is employed in such an expedition as the expedition in question, although he can prove that he was induced to do what he did by a fraudulent misrepresentation of another that a portion of Her Majesty's regular forces was privately near the frontier of the South African Republic to join and co-operate, and that the proposed invasion had the sanction and support of Her Majesty's government—a statement of facts from which, if it was made, anyone, I should think, would naturally and reasonably infer, and would believe that it was intended he should infer, that the licence of Her Majesty, which would legalise the expedition, had been granted. It appears to me that a representation that the expedition had the "sanction" of Her Majesty's government, necessarily involves a representation that the "sanction" had been given in the way in which by this section of the Act of Parliament it could properly be given, namely, with the licence of Her Majesty.

The learned counsel for the defendants contends that, even in such a case, a claim for indemnity, or indeed any claim for damages arising out of the matter which constitutes the offence, is on grounds of public policy legally inadmissible. Speaking for myself, I can see no ground of public policy upon which redress for consequent damage should be refused to the person so led to commit an offence by the false and fraudulent representation of facts which in this case, as I understand this in fact, if true, as he believed them to be, justified the doer in believing that he was acting in accordance with the law. It appears to me that if the defendants' reasoning on this point were adopted, a real injustice might result. Two illustrations drawn from cases which present simpler features than are presented by the present case have occurred to me—the one the case of an offence which is dealt with in courts of summary jurisdiction, the other an offence which is matter of indictment. The Licensing Act, 1872, makes it an offence for any licensed person to sell any intoxicating liquor to any drunken person. It was held in Cundy v. Le Cocq (17) that the prohibition was absolute, and that knowledge of the condition of the person served with liquor was not necessary to constitute the offence. Suppose a person by a fraudulent misrepresentation of the sobriety of another person who gives no indication of intoxication, but whom he knows to be drunk, authorises and induces a licensed victualler, who has no reason to disbelieve, and does honestly believe, the truth of the representation, to sell drink to the drunken person, and the licensed victualler is convicted and fined. Upon what consideration of public policy should a man who, if the representation as to sobriety had been true, would have committed no offence either against law or morals be debarred from any redress against the man who had by fraud inflicted upon him what might be a very serious injury?

Or, take a case under the Lunacy Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict., c. 100), s. 44 [repealed]. A person who receives two or more lunatics into his house, not being a registered asylum or hospital, or a house duly licensed under that Act or any previous Act, commits an indictable offence, and in R. v. Bishop (18) it was held by the Court for Crown Cases Reserved that it afforded no defence to prove, as was proved in that case, that the defendant honestly and on reasonable grounds believed that the persons whom she received were not lunatic. Suppose in such a case that the belief had been induced by a false and fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of the person who requested and authorised the proprietor of the house to receive the persons into his care, I am unable to see upon what ground of public policy or prinprinciple of justice the proprietor, who has been led into the commission of the offence by the fraud of another, and who is free from every imputation of real wrongdoing, should be denied a right of suing for damages the person whose successful fraud has caused him to do that which the law has made an offence. I may add, upon the question of public policy, that, as I think was stated by counsel in the course of the argument, there is express provision in the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, s. 28 [repealed], for the right of a person convicted under the Act recovering the amount of any penalty in which he may have been convicted under the Act together with the costs which have been paid or incurred by him from the person who sold him the adulterated article.

If we turn from the consideration of principles to look for authority, it appeared to be argued by the learned counsel who argued the case before us that there is no decision which can be invoked as an authority upon the point before us. Counsel for the defendants cited a passage from the judgment of LORD MANSFIELD in Holman v. Johnson (1) which does not, in my opinion, appear to have any real bearing upon the question which we are considering, but he relied principally upon the opinion which was expressed by LORD LYNTHURST, C.B., in Colburn v. Patmore (2), in which opinion BOLLAND, ALDERSON, and GURNEY, BB., concurred. It is quoted and criticised in their notes to Lampleigh v. Brathwait (19) by the learned editors of the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh editions of SMITH'S LEADING CASES. It does not appear to me to help the defendants in the present case. The facts shortly were, that the plaintiff, the proprietor of a journal, had been prosecuted and convicted and fined for falsely and maliciously printing and publishing a libel in his print. He thereupon sued the editor for inserting the libel in the journal falsely, maliciously, and negligently, and without his authority or consent, and he claimed to recover damages which included the amount of the fine and the expenses to which he had been put in defending himself. The decision of the court, which was adverse to the plaintiff, was given upon a point of pleading, but there was a very full discussion in the course of the argument as to the right of the plaintiff, having been himself convicted and fined for the libel, to sue the editor for indemnity. The members of the court expressed in the course of their judgments a strong opinion that he had no such right. LORD LYNTHURST, in the passage upon which the present defendants rely said (4 Tyr. at p. 688):

"I am not aware of any case in which a man convicted of an act declared by law to be criminal and punished for it accordingly (in the report in 1 Cr.M. & R. the words are 'who has committed an act declared by law to be criminal') has been suffered to maintain an action against the party who participated with him in the offence, in order to procure indemnity for the damages occasioned by that conviction; but after hearing the argument, I entertain little or no doubt that such an action could not be maintained."

It appears to me that the facts in Colburn v. Patmore (2), or in such an analogous case as LORD LYNTHURST indirectly, I think, had in mind when he pronounced this opinion and the facts as pleaded in the present case, give rise to very different considerations. The plaintiff in Colburn v. Patmore (2) could not, after his conviction, be heard to say that he did not falsely and maliciously publish the libel. As it was put by ALDERSON, B., in the course of the argument, the plaintiff, though actually ignorant, was legally cognisant of the publication of the libel.

As I have already pointed out, it cannot, in my judgment, be successfully contended that the claim for indemnity can be maintained where the doer of the act knew at the time, or must be presumed to have known, the circumstances which made the act either a private wrong or a public crime. Here the gist of the plaintiff's case is that he did not know the facts which made his conduct criminal; but, on the contrary, was led by the defendants to believe and did believe in the existence of a fact—the sanction of the British government—which, if it was given as he had a right, upon the defendants' representation, to assume it had been in the proper way given under the licence of Her Majesty, would have been an answer to any imputation of illegality. Further, while I have felt it to be my duty, after the full and careful arguments addressed to us by the learned counsel, to deal with the case as if the plaintiff had been convicted and was claiming an indemnity for the penal consequences of the commission of a criminal offence, it should, I think, be borne in mind that in fact the plaintiff here has not been convicted, and is claiming, under various heads, damages which are unconnected with the possibility of conviction or punishment. The nearest claim in character to an indemnity for damages consequent upon the conduct of the defendants as inducing the commission of a crime is contained in the allegation that he was brought to England as a prisoner. Whether any of these other heads of damage are so proximately connected with the alleged tortious conduct of the defendants as to be legally available, we have not to consider. It is a matter which, like the proof of the tort itself, the plaintiff will have to prove at the trial. It may be that in any case some of these claims of damage might be legally sustained, even if a claim for indemnity, shortly so called, against the penal consequences of the commission of an offence, could not. I prefer, however, to base my judgment for the plaintiff, in regard to the question before the court, upon the broader grounds which I have stated above.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., A. L. SMITH and RIGBY, L.J.J.), reported [1896] P. 192, affirming a decision of the Admiralty Division disallowing the claim of the appellants to the sum of £1,591 8s. 6d. for the loss of the use of their steam sand-pump dredger No. 7.

The action was brought in rem by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, the appellants, against the respondents, in respect of a collision in which the respondents' steamship Greta Holme ran down and sank the dredger. A decree was pronounced in favour of the appellants subject to a reference to the Admiralty Division to ascertain the amount of damages. Among the items of claim put forward by the appellants was one for the loss of the use of their dredger, and, this item having been disallowed by the registrar, his decision was affirmed by the President of the Admiralty Division, SIR FRANCIS JEUNE. The facts are fully set out in the opinion of LORD WATSON (p. 130 post).

Sir W. Phillimore, T. G. Carrer, and Glynn for the appellants.

Aspinall, Q.C., and Holman for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

July 29, 1897. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—The question in this case is whether the respondents are liable to pay damages to the appellants for the loss by the latter of the use of their steam sand-pump dredger, which was rendered incapable of doing its work for a certain period of time. That the respondents would have been liable for some damages, at all events, if the owners of the dredger had been an individual trading with the use of a machine, does not appear to be denied, though in respect of some part of the damage the Master of the Rolls throws out a doubt, which I am not quite able to follow, as to the remoteness of the damages insisted on.

As I understood the argument of the respondents it came to this. The appellants are a public body who have to maintain the harbour works and the river Mersey in a condition fit for public use, and, as they are not authorised to make any use of their machinery for profit, as a private individual would have been entitled to make, they are not entitled to recover damages, although the fact be not denied that by the negligent act of the respondents the appellants were deprived of the use of their machine for a certain number of weeks. I confess I have some difficulty in following the reasoning or how the conclusion flows from the premises. It is a sufficiently familiar head of damages between individuals that, if one person injures the property of another, damages may be recovered, not only for the amount which it may be necessary to spend in repairs, but also for the loss of the use of the article injured during the period that the repairing may occupy. Nor has it ever been doubted, so far as I am aware, that, if a passenger in a railway collision is injured by the negligence of the railway company, he may recover damages, not only for the pain and suffering and injury to his health, etc., but also for the loss which he sustained by reason of being unable to pursue his ordinary avocations.

In Bradshaw v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Rail. Co. (1), where the question arose whether an executrix might recover, in an action for breach of contract against the railway company, the damage to the deceased's personal estate arising in his lifetime—the medical expenses, and loss occasioned by his inability to attend to business—it was held without doubt that damages for the loss of not being able to attend to business were recoverable. The question there arose in a manner which rendered it peculiarly necessary to determine whether the damage sought to be recovered was the natural and direct consequence of the breach, and, indeed, I think it would have hardly been contested in that case, but that the question there arose whether the maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona applied: Knights v. Quarles (2). The distinction between "tort" and "contract," though pertinent in that case, is immaterial here: see observations of BOWEN, L.J., in Cobb v. Great Western Rail. Co. (3) ([1893] 1 Q.B. at p. 464).

Such being the general state of the law, it is difficult to see upon what ground the legal character filled by the appellants here can affect the question whether they are entitled to recover damages for being deprived of the use of their dredger during the period the dredger was being repaired. That the dredger was required for their use cannot be denied: that their operations in reducing the silting up were delayed by the loss of it cannot be denied. Both those facts are found adversely to the respondents; then why are not the appellants entitled to recover damages for the loss thus sustained? The answer given is that, although their dredging operations were delayed, the appellants sustained no tangible pecuniary loss. I am not quite certain that I understand what is meant by the use of the word "tangible." If by that is meant that, in order to entitle a plaintiff to recover, you must be able to show that, during the period of repair to his vessel, or his cart, or his horse, some specific money has been lost by the period of time during which the article has not been susceptible of being used, the principle so affirmed would, as it appears to me, go very far beyond the particular case now before your Lordships. But, to my mind, it is a principle for which there is no authority whatever. This public body has to pay money, like other people, for the conduct of its operations, and if it is deprived of the use of part of its machinery, which deprivation delays or impairs the progress of their works, I know no reason why they are not entitled to the ordinary rights, which other people possess, of obtaining damages for the loss occasioned by the negligence of the wrong-doer. A

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed, and the appeal allowed. As I understand, it is the wish of the parties not to be sent back for the assessment of damages, and, only because it is their wish, I am ready to express the opinion that £500 ought to be granted the appellants in respect of damages hitherto refused. C

LORD WATSON.—On Mar. 6, 1895, the steamship Greta Holme, belonging to the respondents in this appeal, collided, in the river Mersey, with the steam sand-pump dredger No. 7, which is the property of the appellants, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. Cross-actions were brought by the parties, which were consolidated, and were thereafter disposed of by an order of the Admiralty Court, finding that the Greta Holme was alone to blame for the collision, and condemning her owners in damages and costs. By the same order, the amount of damages was referred to the determination of the registrar, assisted by merchants, and the counterclaim of the respondents was dismissed. The judgment of the Admiralty Court was subsequently affirmed by the Court of Appeal. D

This appeal relates to two items of damage which occur in the claim submitted to the registrar by the present appellants. The first of these is £1,500, being a sum calculated at the rate of £100 per week for fifteen weeks during which the dredger was under repair and could not be used for any purpose by her owners; and the second is £91 8s. 6d., as an allowance for the further period of sixteen days during which she could only be used as a hopper barge, her machinery being still under repair. The registrar, with the concurrence of the merchants by whom he was assisted, reported against both these items of claim. The main reason assigned for that conclusion was that the appellants are not in the position of a trading company which is entitled to claim for loss of profits, and “although their dredging operations were, no doubt, delayed by the disabling of this dredger, it does not appear to us that the plaintiffs have sustained any tangible pecuniary loss.” The report was sustained by the President of the Probate Division, whose decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, consisting of the Master of the Rolls, with A. L. SMITH, L.J., and RIGBY, L.J. The learned judges concurred in the observations made in the report of the registrar, with reference to the position of the appellants as a corporation which does not exist for the purpose of making profits, and as to the absence of any tangible proof of actual loss. E
G

The appellants are a body of trustees who are charged with the duty of maintaining the harbour works and waterway of the river Mersey in the interest of the public, and, in particular, of those members of the public who either own vessels which use the harbour, or are otherwise directly interested in the trade of the port. They derive their available funds from rates levied from those who use their undertaking, which they are empowered to increase in the event of these being insufficient to meet necessary expenditure, and are bound to diminish in the contrary event of the rates being more than sufficient for that purpose. Towards all persons who have an interest in the prosperity of the harbour, the duty of the appellants is to maintain its efficiency in competition with other ports in the United Kingdom, but the only members of the public who have a direct pecuniary interest in their administration are those who pay the rates. As representing their interests, the appellants, although they do not earn profits for distribution among a body of shareholders, are nevertheless bound to conduct their operations in an efficient manner and with due economy; and whenever loss does arise from illegal interference with H their works or plant, it must come out of the pockets of the ratepayers, unless they are recouped by the wrong-doer.

At the time of the collision, No 7 and a twin dredger, both of which are constructed upon a principle which is novel, were engaged in deepening the river near to the landing-stage for large foreign ships, that being a necessary operation, and one which the appellants were desirous of completing. During the repair of No. 7, the other dredger continued to work at the same part of the river; but the result of her losing her companion was that, during the periods of fifteen weeks and sixteen days, so far from making effective progress in the work of deepening, at the end of that time the bottom of the channel stood at a higher level than it had occupied at the commencement. It is proved that for the use of a dredger of the same class as No. 7 a rent of £100 per week could have been obtained without difficulty; and also that the appellants would not have let the dredger, even if it had not been injured by the collision, because it was of importance to them that the work in which it was engaged should be completed without delay.

That it is a wrongful act, although it may not be wilful but simply negligent, to deprive either an individual or a corporation of the services of a dredger or other plant which is constantly required for useful purposes, does not appear to me to be a proposition admitting of serious dispute; and I am not prepared, unless in circumstances which do not occur in this case, to lay down the rule that a corporation which does not pursue its operations for the sake of gain, in the ordinary sense, does not suffer appreciable damage from their interruption. The Master of the Rolls expressed an opinion that the damages sought by the respondents, if not too shadowy, "were too remote to be the proper subject-matter of damages in a collision suit." None of the other learned judges in the court below appears to have taken that view; and, on consideration, I am unable to accept it. The loss to the appellants of the services of dredger No. 7 for a period exceeding the quarter of a year was the natural, necessary, and direct result of her collision with the Greta Holme, to whose fault the collision was solely attributable, and, in my opinion, there is no maritime or other rule which protects the owners of the offending ship against damages attendant upon results of that kind. The evidence of the assistant engineer to the appellants shows that it would have been impossible to supply the place of No. 7 by chartering another suitable dredger. If it had been possible, and if the reasons assigned for the judgments under appeal are valid, that would not have been a justifiable proceeding on the part of the appellants, who, according to these reasons, were suffering no appreciable damage from the want of a dredger. At all events, had they chosen to go to the expense of hiring, they would not have been entitled to recover a single sixpence of the hire paid by them from the respondents.

That is, in my opinion, the logical result of the principles which have been followed by the courts below in the decision of this case—a principle which, if affirmed, would be very far-reaching. They seem to me to go this length, that a corporation who invest large sums of money in a dredger, or in any other article which they intend to use, and do use continuously, for purposes which are of interest to them, but are not productive of private gain, although they protect the pocket of the ratepayer, can recover from a wrong-doer the cost of repairing injury done to these articles, and are not entitled to recover damages from a person who deprives them of the use of such articles without lawful cause. Upon the whole matter, I am of opinion that the appellants have succeeded in proving substantial and not merely nominal damage, and that opinion is not weakened by the fact that, owing to the enforced absence of No. 7 dredger, there was a deposit of silt which would not otherwise have accumulated, and required to be removed after her return to duty. To this extent I entirely agree with the observations of the learned judges that the data for estimating the amount of substantial damage are not precise. In cases like the present that difficulty is sometimes inevitable, and is of common occurrence; but it is a difficulty which can be easily and often satisfactorily overcome by a jury under proper directions. Personally I have a dislike, which I have reason to believe is shared by other judges, for the task of assessing damages in cases like the present; but, having taken the whole facts and probabilities of the case into consideration, I have come to the conclusion that, in respect of the two items in question, the sum allowed to the appellants ought not to be less than £400. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I entirely concur. I take it to be clear that in general a person deprived of the use of a chattel is entitled to recover damages in respect thereof, even though he cannot prove a tangible pecuniary loss, by which is meant a definite sum of money out of pocket, by the wrong sustained. That is not disputed. But it is said, as the plaintiffs are trustees carrying on an undertaking not for profit, there can be no loss of profit by what has occurred, and consequently that they are not entitled to damages. There is no authority for such a proposition. The only case relied on was that of The Rutland (4), and in that case I am not satisfied that it was intended to lay down any such proposition. The learned judge in that case was not satisfied that any damage was sustained. But, however this may be, I think that the proposition cannot be supported on principle. If the appellants had hired a dredger instead of purchasing one, that the respondents would have been bound to make good the sum so paid during the time of repair is beyond doubt. How should they be deprived of payment because they purchased the dredger? The money invested in the dredger was paid out of their pockets, and while deprived of the use of the dredger they had to pay interest on the money. Surely a sum equivalent to that they were at least entitled to. But I think that they are entitled to general damages. It is true that these damages cannot be measured by any scale, nor could that be done in the case of deprivation where an individual has purchased something for the purpose of comfort and not of profit.

LORD MORRIS.—The judgment appealed from unanimously upholds the decision of the President of the Court of Admiralty, who had the report of the registrar, assisted by two merchants, on the reference made to him as to damages. The registrar found that £3,691 11s. 3d., with interest at 4 per cent., was due to the appellants in respect of their claim for damages by reason of the collision. The appellants claimed £5,594 under thirteen different heads. The registrar allowed damages under eleven of those heads, but he allowed no damages under the claim for loss of use of the dredger during the time she was under repairs—somewhere about fifteen weeks.

In my opinion, the order appealed from should be affirmed. We have been furnished with the shorthand-writer's notes in The Rutland (4). A collision took place with a dredger, and the registrar, after inquiry, did not allow any sum for detention during repairs and alterations, which extended over about five months. The President of the Admiralty Court (SIR JAMES HANNEN), in his judgment, affirming the report of the registrar, said :

“The dredger was employed by the harbour authorities, not for the purposes of gain, but for the purpose of making the harbour good and convenient, so that it might attract vessels of greater draught of water. It was, therefore, not like a ship built for the purpose of being employed on a voyage which, if damage was done, would entitle the owner to compensation. There was no such prospect in this case, which must be looked at purely from the point of view of the damages capable of being estimated in money if the harbour authorities suffered by the dredger being disabled. The registrar came to the conclusion that no tangible damage had been done. It had not been suggested that it could have been let during the time it was detained for repairs.”

The present case appears to me substantially identical with that of The Rutland (4).

Apart from this authority, what case have the appellants made out? Their engineer stated that, if they chose to let the dredger, they could get £100 a week for it, and that they had applications. This evidence is merely chimerical, and it has been properly put aside by the Master of the Rolls as merely imaginary. The appellants had no intention of ever letting the dredger. It was used to deepen and to keep deep the river; and what damage could the appellants suffer by reason of its detention during repairs? Apart from personal inconvenience or aggravated circumstances, the appellants, in order to recover pecuniary loss, must show that the character of the detriment has been pecuniary. The appellants could only recover the actual loss sustained, of which they had given some reasonable proof. In my opinion, the appellants have not suffered any such loss. The work on which the dredger was engaged might have been to some extent delayed, but no pecuniary loss arose, which, in my opinion, is the only subject on which they can recover damages. The American steamers came and went, and so did the ordinary shipping using the Mersey; so that there was no loss of dues. Damages given in such a case could be but the merest guesswork founded upon no evidence.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., LOPES and RIGBY, L.JJ.), reported [1895] 1 Q.B. 286, reversing a decision of HENN COLLINS, J., at the trial at the Manchester Assizes of an action brought by the appellants against the respondents for an injunction to restrain the latter from using the word "camel hair" in such a manner as to deceive purchasers into the belief that they were purchasing goods of the appellants' manufacture and from passing off their goods as and for goods of the appellants' manufacture.

According to the case of the appellant company, the appellant Frank Reddaway had been for many years a manufacturer of machine belting, and in October, 1892, he converted his business into a limited company under the title of F. Reddaway & Co., Ltd., the appellant company. Up to the year 1877 machine belting was generally made of leather, but for some years previously to that date the Lancashire Belting Co. had been manufacturing and selling, under the name of the Lancashire belt, belting composed of woven material identical with that subsequently used by the appellant Frank Reddaway for his camel-hair belting. In 1877 Frank Reddaway began making woven belting from yarn similar to that used in making carpets, which yarn consisted principally of wool or hair, and sold the belting as "woollen belting," or as "solid woven worsted belting," and, finding that belting so made was greatly superior, especially in warm climates and in places where the belting was exposed to atmospheric influences, to all other forms of belting, and that his business in such belting was rapidly increasing, he began about the year 1879 for the purpose of identifying his belting and distinguishing it from the belting of other manufacturers, to advertise his belting as "camel-hair belting." Subsequently, he began to use the terms "camel belting," and "camel brand belting" in connection with his belting. From time to time he issued large numbers of circulars and price lists, in which he described his belting as "camel hair belting," and in 1881 he registered as a trade mark the figure of a camel with three pulleys and a belt going round them. In subsequent years he registered other trade marks, in all of which either the figure of a camel or the word "camel" appeared, and was usually combined with drawings of pulleys and belting. Down to the date of this action the appellant Frank Reddaway and the appellants F. Reddaway & Co., Ltd., had widely and continuously advertised their belting in connection with such trade marks, and described it in trade lists and circulars as "camel hair," or "camel," or "camel brand" belting, and had spent in advertising it upwards of £18,000. A

The yarn which was the chief constituent of the appellants' belting was made from a mixture of hair and wool, which was imported into this country from various Eastern ports, and was largely sold in this country to carpet manufacturers and others as "camel-hair yarn." It was admitted by the counsel for the appellants that "camel-hair yarn" was made of camel hair, and that camel-hair yarn constituted the largest ingredient of their belting. Prior to the use of this material by the appellant Frank Reddaway in the manufacture of belts, it was sold as brown worsted, and, except to the extent to which it was used for belting by the Lancashire Belting Co., it was used exclusively by carpet manufacturers. A very large proportion of the appellants' trade in such belting was with India and the colonies, to which countries large quantities of the belting had been consigned, and such belting had for many years past acquired a high reputation there. All such belting so consigned was stamped by the appellants, either with the figure of a camel, or with the word "camel," or both, and had come to be generally known, and was commonly inquired for as "camel" or "camel hair" belting, without any mention of the makers' name, the only persons or firms in India who had until recently used either the name "camel" or the figure of a camel in connection with belting being the appellants. C D

The respondent George Banham had been in the employment of the appellants, but he left it about the end of 1889, and commenced the manufacture of cotton belting on his own account on a small scale. This belting he called "solid woven cotton belting." Subsequently he manufactured belting of the same materials as those from which the appellants' camel belting was made, except that linen was used as a substitute for cotton for binding the belting, and this belting he sold and advertised as "Arabian" belting. In 1891 he turned his business into a limited company, who were the respondents, George Banham & Co., Ltd., and they, in April or May, 1891, commenced selling and advertising belting as camel hair belting, selling it in England and also exporting it to India and elsewhere. The respondent, George Banham, stated during his cross-examination at the trial that the words "camel hair belting" and no other words or marks were in almost all cases stamped on the belting itself, and that only in a few exceptional instances did the respondent company stamp their names or any other distinguishing mark on their belting, with the result that the purchasers had no means of knowing who were the manufacturers of the articles they bought. E F

The appellants brought this action against the respondents to restrain them from infringing their trade mark. At the trial of the action, at Manchester, before HENN COLLINS, J., and a special jury, the learned judge left the following questions to the jury: G

- (i) "Does camel hair belting mean belting made by the plaintiffs as distinguished from belting made by other manufacturers? Answer: Yes. (ii) Or does it mean belting of a particular kind without reference to any particular maker? Answer: No. (iii) Do the defendants so describe their belting as to be likely to mislead purchasers, and to lead them to buy the defendants' belting as and for the belting of the plaintiffs? Answer: Yes. (iv) Did the defendants endeavour to pass off their goods as and for the goods of the plaintiffs so as to be likely to deceive purchasers? Answer: Yes." H

Upon these findings of the jury HENN COLLINS, J., entered judgment for the appellants with costs. The Court of Appeal reversed the decision of the learned judge on the ground that the belting of the respondents was made of such a material that it might fairly and properly be described as "camel hair belting," and that consequently the respondents were entitled to describe it as such in the manner in which they had described it. Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Mar. 26, 1896. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I believe this case turns upon a question of fact. The question of law is so constantly mixed up with the various questions of fact which arise on an inquiry of the character in which your Lordships have been engaged, that it is sometimes difficult, when examining former decisions, to disentangle what is decided as fact and what is laid down as a principle of law. For myself, I believe the principle of law may be very plainly stated, and that is that nobody has any right to represent his goods as the goods of somebody else. How far the use of particular words, signs, or pictures does or does not come up to the proposition which I have enunciated, in each particular case must always be a question of evidence, and the more simple the phraseology, the more a mere description of the article sold comes to be nearer to or far from a representation of the goods of the rival manufacturer, the greater becomes the difficulty of proof, but if the proof establishes the fact, the legal consequence appears to follow.

In this case the words "camel hair belting" suggest such a difficulty of proof. If I had been sitting as a jurymen in this case I confess (but for a circumstance I am about to mention) I should have had great difficulty in acquiescing in the contention that a person was making his goods pass as the goods of somebody else by simply describing the subject of sale by these words. This belting is partly made or substantially made of camel hair. To me or to other persons not familiar with the trade this undoubtedly does seem simply a description of the article sold, and not a representation of its being made by a particular manufacturer. But then I should not know what persons engaged in the trade would know how far particular words, even though descriptive of the article sold, may have acquired a kind of technical signification which would give to them in the trade as completely the character of being made by a particular manufacturer as if they were stamped with his trade mark. The circumstance to which I referred is to be found in a letter dated June 12, 1891. The writer, who doubtless knew what he was doing, specially desires that the thing which he is ordering should bear no other stamp than "Camel Hair Belting," and if he gets that he adds: "I think I can take this order from Reddaways." I think that with this letter before them the jury were perfectly right, and that my prima facie impression from the words being only descriptive of the article sold would have been wrong.

The result is, in my mind, that the proof is satisfactory, and that one man's goods are being sold as if they were the goods of the other. Reliance appears to have been placed in the Court of Appeal on what was supposed to be decided in Burgess v. Burgess (2) by KNIGHT BRUCE and TURNER, L.JJ., and I think it is necessary to examine the decision in Burgess v. Burgess (2) to see what it really did decide and the facts upon which the decision was based. KINDERSLEY, V.-C., had by an injunction restrained the defendant from continuing to use the words "Late of 107, Strand," where he had been employed by his father, and from continuing on the sides of his shop door a plate with the words "Burgess's Fish Sauce Warehouse, late of 107, Strand." The defendant Burgess had for many years been in the employment of his father in the trade of an Italian and fish sauce warehouseman, and had shortly before the application for the injunction set up in King William Street a similar business, placing the words of which the Vice-Chancellor restrained the use on his shop door and the sides of his house. An appeal was brought against the refusal of the Vice-Chancellor to go further, and to prohibit the use of the words "Burgess's Essence of Anchovies" on any billhead, invoice, or advertisement. The refusal of KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., to interfere with what the Vice-Chancellor had determined is stated by himself to be grounded on the fact that the defendant carried on business under his own name, "sells his essence of anchovies, which appears to be assumed to be a known article as Burgess's Essence of Anchovies, which in truth it is." The learned lord justice said (3 De G.M. & G. at p. 904):

“The whole ground of complaint is the great celebrity which during many years has been possessed by the elder Mr. Burgess’s essence of anchovies. That does not give him such exclusive right, such a monopoly, such a privilege as to prevent any man from making essence of anchovies and selling it under his own name.” A

He thus treated the words “essence of anchovies” as describing a known article not peculiar to any one manufacturer. TURNER, L.J., I think, most accurately says (ibid. at p. 905): B

“It is a question of evidence in each case whether there is false representation or not. Looking at the labels before us, I think it is clear that, since the order made by the Vice-Chancellor, there has been no representation made on the part of the defendant that the goods which he is selling are the goods manufactured by the plaintiffs.” C

I only have to add to that that even then the learned judges did not conclude the question, for, dealing with an interlocutory injunction, as they were, they left the plaintiff, if he thought proper to try his action at law, and make out, if he could, that there was the false representation, which if made, would give a ground of action. But it is most important to observe the hypothesis of fact upon which that judgment proceeds, and if the facts, such as they have been established in his case could have been made out, I cannot understand that there is any principle of law laid down which would have prevented an injunction, although the defendant’s name was “Burgess,” and although the article was described by a descriptive name, which, however, had not, as a matter of fact, in that case in the view of the judges the technical signification of being only made by Burgess the father. D

It seems to me, therefore, that there is nothing in that decision, or indeed in any other, which interferes with the propriety of an injunction where the proposition of fact with which I have started can be established; and it is to be observed that whatever the form of the injunction, if the principle of it is duly observed, it is only such a form as prevents the mischief pointed to. It would be impossible, for instance, to say that a trader could not describe his goods truly by enumerating the particulars of which they consisted, unless such description was calculated to deceive and make his goods pass as the goods of another. What in each case or in each trade will produce the effect intended to be prohibited is a matter which must depend upon the circumstances of each trade, and the peculiarities of each trade. It would be very rash a priori to say how far a thing might or might not be described without being familiar with the technology of the trade. For these reasons I move that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be reversed, and that the respondents do pay to the appellants the costs both here and below. E

LORD HERSCHELL stated the facts and continued: Upon the findings of the jury HENN COLLINS, J., entered judgment for the appellants with costs, and he granted an injunction restraining the respondents from continuing to use the word “camel hair” in such a manner as to lead purchasers into the belief that they are purchasing belting of the appellants’ manufacture, and from thereby passing off their belting as and for the belting of the appellants’ manufacture. On appeal, the judgment of HENN COLLINS, J., was reversed, and judgment entered for the respondents. In the opinion of the Court of Appeal inasmuch as the words “camel hair belting” were descriptive of the article sold, the words “camel hair” indicating the material of which it was made, the respondents were entitled to use the same language as that used by the appellants with reference to the belting which they sold, and the appellants could have no right to restrain them from doing so, even though, as the jury had found the words “camel hair belting” would be understood to mean belting manufactured by the appellants, and purchasers of the belting would be deceived into the belief that they were obtaining goods of the appellants’ F manufacture. The Master of the Rolls expressed the view that a manufacturer might obtain the right to prevent a person using a name which would be understood as his, and the use of which would thus interfere with his trade, but that, though this was the fundamental proposition, you could not restrain a man from telling the simple truth, and that this was all the respondents had done when they called their belting "camel hair belting." It must be taken, if the findings of the jury are to stand, on which I shall have a word or two to say presently, that the description by the respondents of their belting as "camel hair belting" would deceive purchasers into the belief that they were getting something which they were not getting, namely, belting made by Reddaway. If they would be thus deceived by the respondents' statement, there must surely be some fallacy in saying that they have told the simple truth. I will state presently where I think the fallacy lurks.

Before I do so, however, it is right that I should say that there appears to me abundant evidence to support the findings of the jury. For many years belting made of camel hair yarn had been known in the markets of the world. It had been sold under a variety of names. But there was ample evidence to justify the finding that among those who were the purchasers of such goods the words "camel hair" were not applied to belting made of that material in general—that, in short, it did not mean in the market belting made of a particular material, but meant belting made by a particular manufacturer. It is impossible, I think, to read the correspondence which passed between the respondents and those who were ordering goods of, or procuring orders for them, without seeing that this was the case. Moreover, it is impossible to doubt that the respondents were well aware of the fact. They begin by calling their belting "Arabian," and state that they are prepared to guarantee it "to be better than the belting commonly called 'camel-hair belting.'" They are told by one of their correspondents that if he has a sample similar to one he forwards (which was made by Reddaway) "stamped 'Camel Hair Belting,' nothing more" he thinks he can take this order from Reddaways. They do their best to comply with their correspondents' wish, and send belting so stamped. Another correspondent asks for 500 feet, which is to be quite equal to Reddaways' "Camel Hair Belting," and must be in every respect identical with the sample of that make. It was to be stamped "Warranted best Camel Hair Belting." In that, or another case, it is not quite clear which, the respondents stated to the firm whom they employed to manufacture the belting that no manufacturer's name must appear on it or it would be useless.

I see no reason to be otherwise than completely satisfied with the answers which the jury gave. On this assumption I proceed to inquire whether the appellants have made out any right to relief. I cannot help saying that, if the respondents are entitled to lead purchasers to believe that they are getting the appellants' manufacture when they are not, and thus to cheat the appellants of some of their legitimate trade, I should regret to find that the law was powerless to enforce the most elementary principles of commercial morality. I do not think that your Lordships are driven to any such conclusion. The principle which is applicable to this class of cases was, in my judgment, well laid down by LORD KINGSDOWN in Leather Cloth Co. v. American Cloth Co. (1). It had been previously enunciated in much the same way by LORD LANGDALE in Croft v. Day (3). LORD KINGSDOWN'S words were as follows (11 H.L.Cas. at p. 538):

"The fundamental rule is that one man has no right to put off his goods for sale as the goods of a rival trader, and he cannot, therefore (in the language of LORD LANGDALE in the case of Perry v. Truefitt (6 Beav. at p. 73) 'be allowed to use names, marks, letters, or other indicia by which he may induce purchasers to believe that the goods which he is selling are the manufacture of another person.' "

It is, in my opinion, this fundamental rule which governs all cases, whatever be the particular mode adopted by any man for putting off his goods as those of a rival trader, whether it is done by the use of a mark which has become his trade mark, or in any other way. A

The word "property" has been sometimes applied to what has been termed a trade mark at common law. I doubt myself whether it is accurate to speak of there being property in such a trade mark, though, no doubt, some of the rights which are incident to property may attach to it. Where the trade mark is a word or device never in use before, and meaningless except as indicating by whom the goods in connection with which it is used were made, there can be no conceivable legitimate use of it by another person. His only object in employing it in connection with goods of his manufacture must be to deceive. In circumstances such as these the mere proof that the trade mark of one manufacturer had been thus appropriated by another would be enough to bring the case within the rule as laid down by LORD KINGSDOWN, and to entitle the person aggrieved to an injunction to restrain its use. In the case of a trade mark thus identified with a particular manufactory the rights of the person whose trade mark it was would not, it may be, differ substantially from those which would exist if it were, strictly speaking, his property. But there are other cases which equally come within the rule that a man may not pass off his goods as those of his rival, which are not of this simple character—cases where the mere use of the particular mark or device which has been employed by another manufacturer would not of itself necessarily indicate that the person who employed it was thereby inducing purchasers to believe that the goods he was selling were the goods of another manufacturer. The name of a person, or words forming part of the common stock of language, may become so far associated with the goods of a particular maker that it is capable of proof that the use of them by themselves without explanation or qualification by another manufacturer would deceive a purchaser into the belief that he was getting the goods of B. In a case of this description the mere proof by the plaintiff that the defendant was using a name, word, or device which he had adopted to distinguish his goods would not entitle him to any relief. He could only obtain it by proving further that the defendant was using it under such circumstances, or in such manner as to put off his goods as the goods of the plaintiff. If he could succeed in proving this, I think that he would, on well-established principles, be entitled to an injunction. B
F

In my opinion, the doctrine on which the judgment of the Court of Appeal was based—that where a manufacturer has used as his trade mark a descriptive word, he is never entitled to relief against a person who so uses it as to induce in purchasers the belief that they are getting the goods of the manufacturer who has theretofore employed it as his trade mark—is not supported by authority, and cannot be defended on principle. I am unable to see why a man should be allowed in this way, more than in any other, to deceive purchasers into the belief that they are getting what they are not, and thus to filch the business of a rival. The authority relied on was Burgess v. Burgess (2). When the judgments in that case are examined, it seems to me clear that no such point was decided. TURNER, L.J., commences by saying (3 De G.M. & G. at pp. 904, 905): G

"No man can have any right to represent his goods as the goods of another person; but in applications of this kind it must be made out that the defendant is selling his own goods as the goods of another."

He then points out that where a person is selling goods under a particular name, and a person not having that name is using it, it may be presumed that he so uses it to represent the goods sold by himself as the goods of the person whose name he uses; but where the defendant sells goods under his own name, and it happens that the plaintiff has the same name, it does not follow that the defendant is selling his goods as the goods of the plaintiff. He adds: "It is a question of evidence in each case whether there is a false representation or not." This, I think, clearly recognises that a man may so use even his own name in connection with the sale of goods so as to make a false representation. I

In Massam v. Thorley's Cattle Food Co. (5), JAMES, L.J., said (14 Ch.D. at p. 752) :

“Burgess v. Burgess (2) has been very much misunderstood if it has been understood to decide that anybody can always use his own name as a description of an article whatever may be the consequences of it, or whatever may be the motive for doing it, or whatever may be the result of it.”

After quoting from the judgment of TURNER, L.J., the passages to which I have just referred, he said (ibid. at p. 753) :

“That I take to be an accurate statement of the law, and to have been adopted by the House of Lords in Wotherspoon v. Currie (6) in which the House of Lords differed from the view which I had taken.”

The decision in Wotherspoon v. Currie (6) is an important one, and is, in my judgment, inconsistent with the ratio decidendi of the Court of Appeal in the present case. The name “Glenfield” had become associated with the starch manufactured by the plaintiff, and the defendant, although he established his manufactory at Glenfield, was restrained from using that word in connection with his goods in such a way as to deceive. Where the name of a place precedes the name of an article sold, it prima facie means that this is its place of production or manufacture. It is descriptive, as it strikes me, in just the same sense as “camel hair” is descriptive of the material of which the plaintiff’s belting is made. LORD WESTBURY pointed out that the term “Glenfield” had acquired in the trade a secondary signification different from its primary one, that in connection with the word starch it had come to mean starch which was the manufacture of the plaintiff. In Massam v. Thorley's Cattle Food Co. (5) just referred to, JAMES, L.J., said (14 Ch.D. at p. 753) :

“The defendant was actually manufacturing starch at Glenfield, having gone thither for the purpose of enabling him to say that he was manufacturing it at Glenfield. The House of Lords said that the mere fact that he was really carrying on his manufacture at Glenfield, and was not, therefore, telling a lie, did not exempt him from the consequence of the fact that his proceedings were intended and calculated to produce on the mind of the purchasers the belief that his article was the article of the plaintiffs.”

I think that this view of the decision of the House of Lords was correct, and that it is at variance with the view taken by the Court of Appeal that the respondents in the present case could not be liable to an action because in using the words “camel hair,” in connection with their belting, they were simply telling the truth. I rather demur, however, to the statement of JAMES, L.J., that the defendant in Wotherspoon v. Currie (6) was not telling a lie in calling his starch “Glenfield starch,” as I do to the view that the respondents here were telling the simple truth when they sold their belting as camel hair belting. I think the fallacy lies in overlooking the fact that a word may acquire in a trade a secondary signification differing from its primary one, and that if it is used to persons in the trade who will understand it, and be known and intended to understand it in its secondary sense, it will none the less be a falsehood that in its primary sense it may be true. A man who uses language which will convey to persons reading or hearing it a particular idea which is false, and knows and intends this to be the case, is surely not to be absolved from a charge of falsehood, because in another sense which will not be conveyed and is not intended to be conveyed, it is true. In the present case the jury have found, and, in my opinion, there was ample evidence to justify it, that the words “camel hair” had in the trade acquired a secondary signification in connection with belting, that they did not convey to persons dealing in belting the idea that it was made of camel’s hair, but that it was belting manufactured by the appellants. They have found that the effect of using the words in the manner in which they were used by the respondents would be to lead purchasers to believe that they were obtaining goods manufactured by the appellants, and thus both to deceive them and to injure the appellants. On authority, as well as on principle, I think the appellants are in these facts entitled to relief. A

Massam v. Thorley's Cattle Food Co. (5), from the judgment of JAMES, L.J., from which I have already quoted, is an authority in favour of the appellants' contention. It was argued for the respondents that in that case there was fraud, inasmuch as Thorley, whose name formed part of the designation of the company, had only a small, indeed, it may be said a nominal, interest in it. I do not think that this was the foundation of the judgment; the reasoning of JAMES, L.J., would have been equally forcible if Thorley's interest had been the principal one. The company had quite as much right to call themselves by the name they adopted as by any other. What they were restrained from doing was endeavouring to pass off their goods as the goods of another manufacturer. This was the wrongful act which brought them within the reach of the law, and not the particular means by which they carried out their design. B C

Besides the cases to which I have referred, there are other authorities which support the appellants' case. I need only mention one—Montgomery v. Thompson (7) in your Lordships' House. It was said in the court below that the judgment there proceeded on the ground that the defendant had acted fraudulently. But the only fraud consisted in doing acts designed to cause persons to purchase his goods as and for the plaintiffs'. The acts commented on were only the means devised to accomplish that end. On the findings of the jury I think that precisely the same kind of fraud is present in the case under appeal. I ought, perhaps, to notice Turton v. Turton (8), which was said to be an authority in the respondents' favour. The case was, I think, an entirely different one. There was no proof that the defendants were passing off their goods as those of the plaintiffs, the utmost that was shown was that similarity (there was not identity) in the name of the firms might lead incautious persons to make mistakes. Reliance was placed for the respondents upon the decision of Wood, V.-C., in Young v. Macrae (9), and in the Court of Appeal RIGBY, L.J., regarded it as adverse to the appellants' contention. When carefully examined I do not think that it is so. Where a patentee attaches a particular name to the production he patents, that name becomes common property as descriptive of the patented article. It possesses, indeed, no other name. That name would necessarily be applied to it by all persons desiring to purchase the article. It is not descriptive of the production of a particular manufacturer, but of the article itself, by whomsoever it is manufactured. Indeed, there is no presumption that the patentee will manufacture it, even during the term of the patent; more often than not patented articles are manufactured by other persons by the licence of the patentee. D E F G

What right, it was asked, can an individual have to restrain another from using a common English word because he has chosen to employ it as his trade mark? I answer, he has no such right; but he has a right to insist that it shall not be used without explanation or qualification if such a use would be an instrument of fraud. Who suffer injury by such a conclusion, or would be the worse if the defendant is thus restrained? It has been shown that the public had not needed the words "camel hair" do describe a particular kind of belting, that the words have never been used in the trade in that sense. What JAMES, L.J., said in Thorley's Case (5) is applicable to the present. He observed (14 Ch.D. at p. 755): H I

"Thorley's Food for Cattle had never become an article of commerce as distinguished from the particular manufactory from which it had proceeded."

It is not proposed, in the present case, to prohibit the use of the words "camel hair" altogether. The injunction granted by HENN COLLINS, J., had not that effect. In the case just referred to the counsel for the plaintiff, at the conclusion of the judgment, asked whether the substance of their Lordships' judgment was not that the defendants were not to use the name Thorley in connection with their cattle food. JAMES, L.J., replied (ibid. at p. 763):

“We cannot prohibit them from using the name if they use it in a way not calculated to mislead the public.”

I say the same about the use of the words “camel hair” in the present case. For these reasons, I think that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—In this case your Lordships are not asked, at least by the appellants, to lay down any new law. The appellants are content to rely upon the old and familiar doctrines of the court which have been repeated over and over again. In a well-known trade mark case—Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Loog (10), in which there was no claim to a registered mark—JAMES, L.J., said (18 Ch.D. at p. 412):

“I have often endeavoured to express what I am going to express now (and probably I have said it in the same words, because it is very difficult to find other words in which to express it), that is, that no man is entitled to represent his goods as being the goods of another man; and no man is permitted to use any mark, sign, or symbol, device or other means whereby, without making a direct false representation himself to a purchaser who purchases from him, he enables such purchaser to tell a lie, or to make a false representation to somebody else who is the ultimate customer. That being, as it appears to me, a comprehensive statement of what the law is upon the question of trade mark or trade designation, I am of opinion that there is no such thing as a monopoly, or a property in the nature of a copyright, or in the nature of a patent, in the use of any name. Whatever name is used to designate goods, anybody may use that name to designate goods, always subject to this, that he must not, as I said, make directly or through the medium of another person, a false representation that his goods are the goods of another person. That I take to be the law.”

I have cited this passage because it seems to me to state clearly the principle on which Mr. Reddaway and his associates are entitled to relief against Mr. Banham and the company of which he is managing director. The substance of Reddaway's complaint, as I understand it, is that Mr. Banham is putting his goods on the market under a designation which enables purchasers from him to make a false representation to their customers. It is immaterial that the designation in question taken by itself would convey to a person not conversant with the trade information which cannot be called untrue, if by means of that designation Mr. Banham does make, not perhaps directly, but certainly through the medium of other persons, a false representation that his goods are the goods of Reddaway. Reddaway and Banham—I use those names for shortness—are both manufacturers of hair belting, a kind of belting which is much used for driving machinery. This article has a large sale at home and abroad. In countries where the heat is great and the air very dry it is preferable to leather. Hair belting, whoever the maker of it may be, is generally composed more or less of stuff imported into England, and sold in the English market as “camel hair.” Until recently nobody seems to have imagined that the camel hair of commerce was true to name. It was believed to be a mixture of hair—hair of sheep and goats, and various Eastern animals—in which the hair of the camel might be found, but which did not even pretend to be really camel's hair. Indeed, so little importance was attached to its nominal connection with the camel, that until it acquired some celebrity through Reddaway's manufacture, the yarn made from it used to be sold in the market simply as brown worsted. It seems to have been the fashion for manufacturers of hair belting to distinguish their goods by the name of some chosen animal, hairy or hairless. There was, for instance, “buffalo belting,” “yak belting” and “crocodile belting.” Reddaway, unfortunately for him, as it turned out, selected the camel as his emblem. He called his belting "camel hair belting." Owing to the excellence of his manufacture, his belting became widely known all over the world. It was advertised as camel hair belting. It was ordered, sold, and invoiced as such; and so camel hair belting came to mean Reddaway's belting, and nothing else.

It was admitted at the trial that for about fourteen years no belting had been made or sold under the description of camel hair or camel hair belting except by Reddaway and certain persons whom he had promptly challenged and stopped. Indeed, so long as the expression camel hair belting was taken to be a fanciful designation, Reddaway had no difficulty in holding the field against any interloper who hoped to find more profit and less trouble in trading on another man's reputation than on his own merits. Banham was for two years in the employment of Reddaway at his works. In 1889 he set up for himself, and began to make hair belting. Like others in the trade he used more or less the camel hair of commerce. At first he called his belting "Arabian belting." Then he began cautiously and tentatively to offer his goods as "camel hair belting." After 1891, when he turned his business into a limited company, his proceedings were marked with less caution; at least, they attracted Reddaway's attention, and then the present action was brought. The action was launched on the footing that the expression camel hair belting was a fanciful term. But in the course of the trial it was proved, partly by the evidence of experts, and partly by an exhibit collected from a living animal in the Zoological Gardens at Manchester, that the camel hair of commerce, of which many bundles were produced, was really and truly for the most part composed of genuine camel's hair. This evidence seems to have come as a revelation to Reddaway and his advisers. However, they accepted the situation, and forbore to contest the point further. And so it was established that Reddaway's trade designation, instead of being, as everybody supposed, a fanciful term, was nothing more or less than a substantially accurate description of the material of which his belting was composed.

The Court of Appeal treat this discovery as the end of the whole matter. They hold that, on this one fact being established, Banham became entitled to put his goods on the market as camel hair belting without any qualification whatever. Anybody and everybody who wants to get a footing in the connection which Reddaway has formed is now free, if the Court of Appeal is right, to use Reddaway's password. The appellants concede—they cannot, indeed, any longer dispute—that everybody who makes belting of camel hair is entitled to describe his belting as camel hair belting, provided he does so fairly. But they contend, and I think with reason, that neither Banham nor anybody else is entitled to steal Reddaway's trade under colour of imparting accurate and possibly interesting information. Practically the only difference which the unexpected turn in the evidence has made is this: the case now comes more properly under the second branch of the proposition laid down by JAMES, L.J., whereas, if camel hair belting had kept its place as a fanciful term it would have fallen under the first. The learned counsel for the respondents maintained that the expression camel hair belting used by Banham was "the simple truth." Their proposition was that "where a man is simply telling the truth as to the way in which his goods are made, or as to the materials of which they are composed, he cannot be held liable for mistakes which the public may make." That seems to me to be rather begging the question. Can it be said that the description "camel hair belting," as used by Banham, is the simple truth? I will not call it an abuse of language to say so, but certainly it is not altogether a happy expression. The whole merit of that description, its one virtue, for Banham's purposes, lies in its duplicity. It means two things. At Banham's works, where it cannot mean Reddaway's belting, it may be construed to mean belting made of camel's hair. Abroad to the German manufacturer, to the Bombay millowner, to the up-country native it must mean Reddaway's belting—it can mean nothing else. I venture to think that a statement which is literally true, but is intended to convey a false impression, has something of a faulty ring about it. It is not sterling coin; it has no right to the genuine stamp and impress of truth.

I have now dealt with the only peculiarity in the case. For the rest the action is one of a very ordinary type. In a trial which lasted three days, after a summing-up which seems to me to be admirably concise and clear, a special jury of the county of Lancaster found that "camel hair belting" means belting made by Reddaway, and that it does not mean belting of a peculiar kind without reference to any particular maker. They also found that the respondents describe their belting so as to be likely to mislead customers, and to lead them to buy their belting as and for the belting of the appellants. There was another finding, not perhaps necessary for the decision, on which I desire to say a few words. It is stated in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, that the learned counsel for the appellants at the trial did not appear to have asked the judge to leave to the jury the question whether the respondents had done anything fraudulently. "Indeed," his Lordship adds, "no such question seems to have been raised by the pleadings." If your Lordships turn to the pleadings you will observe that the question was raised directly. It is quite true that the word fraud is not to be found in the statement of claim. But the whole gist of the action was that the respondents were endeavouring to palm off their goods as the goods of the appellants by selling them under a designation which would enable purchasers from them in this country to deceive customers abroad. That is, as it seems to me, a charge of dishonesty, and I must say I think the charge was established. It was proved by admissions wrung from Mr. Banham on cross-examination and by the correspondence which was put in evidence. When a manufacturer's goods are a drug on the market, so long as they bear his own name, or proclaim their true origin, and yet are saleable at once if marked with nothing but some common English words, and when that manufacturer holds himself out as ready and willing so to mark his goods, and does so mark them at the "instigation," as he says, of a purchaser, a Lancashire jury may perhaps be trusted to solve the riddle. The jury found, and, in my opinion, rightly found, that the respondents endeavoured to pass off their goods as and for the goods of the appellants.

Cases of this sort must depend upon their particular circumstances. The facts of one case are little or no guide to the determination of another. I do not, therefore, propose to trouble your Lordships with any reference to authorities except those relied on in the judgment of the Court of Appeal. The judgment of TURNER, L.J., in Burgess v. Burgess (2), though eclipsed, as it has been said, in public favour by the brilliancy and point of his colleague's language, is an accurate and masterly summary of the law. But it seems to me to be an authority in favour of Reddaway, and not in favour of Banham. I am quite at a loss to know why Turton v. Turton (8) was ever reported. The plaintiff's case there was extravagant and absurd. With regard to Young v. Macrae (9), which is referred to at some length, it must be remembered that it was a judgment on an interlocutory application, and that the Vice-Chancellor reserved the question for the hearing with an intimation that it would then deserve serious consideration. It does not seem to me to have any bearing upon the present case, and I only notice it to observe that whenever it is quoted the Vice-Chancellor's comments upon his own decision ought not to be lost sight of. On a later occasion in Braham v. Bustard (11) the Vice-Chancellor said (1 Hem. & M. at p. 454) :

"I had to consider this question in the case of Young's paraffin oil [Young v. Macrae (9)], and in that case if the evidence had shown that the plaintiff had been the first to apply the name paraffin to the oil, I should have granted an injunction, but there I had it proved that the name 'paraffin oil' had long been known as the scientific name of the article, and that the defendant could not well have called it anything else."

Lastly, Montgomery v. Thompson (7) was cited, but only for the purpose of putting it aside; I am sure I do not know why. That was a gross case, no doubt, but fraud is infinite in variety. Sometimes it is audacious and unblushing; sometimes it pays a sort of homage to virtue, and then it is modest and retiring; it would be honesty itself if it could only afford it. But fraud is fraud all the same; and it is the fraud, not the manner of it, which calls for the interposition of the court. In principle and in substance I can see no difference between the present case and Montgomery v. Thompson (7).

In the result I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed. As regards the form of the injunction I should be disposed to say that in all cases where the defendant is to be restrained from using unfairly words or marks which he is at liberty to use provided only they are used fairly, it would be better that the injunction should go in the form approved by this House in Johnston v. Orr Ewing (12), and I, therefore, concur in the motion that has been proposed.

LORD MORRIS.—I have felt some difficulty in concurring as I do in the judgment proposed to be given in favour of the appellants by your Lordships, for it establishes, and, in my opinion, for the first time, the proposition that a trader is not permitted merely to tell truthfully and accurately the material of which his goods are made. I find myself coerced, however, to a conclusion against the respondents by the finding of the jury, which amounts to this, that camel hair belting had become so identified with the name of the appellants, Reddaway, as that camel hair belting had in the market obtained the meaning of Reddaway's belting, and there was sufficient evidence given at the trial to support that finding of the jury. That finding establishes as a fact that use of the words "camel hair belting" simpliciter deceives purchasers, and it becomes necessary for the respondents to remove that false impression so made on the public. That something, to my mind, is obviously done when the respondents put prominently and in a conspicuous place on the article the statement that it was camel hair belting manufactured by themselves. Having done so, they would, as it appears to me, fully apprise purchasers that it was not Reddaway's make, by stating that it was their own. A representation deceiving the public is and must be the foundation of the appellants' right to recover; they are not entitled to any monopoly of the name "camel hair belting," irrespective of its deceiving the public, and everyone has a right to describe truly his article by that name provided he distinguishes it from the appellants' make. In this case the respondents did not so distinguish it, because they omitted to state that it was their own make. Consequently, I concur in the motion which has been made.

GROVES v. LORD WIMBORNE

Statutory Duty—Breach—Competency of civil action at suit of injured person—Construction of statute as a whole—Penalty provided for breach—Matters to be considered—Factory—Failure to fence dangerous machinery—Injury to worker.

When a statute provides for the performance by a certain person of a particular duty and someone for whose protection the statute was passed is injured by a failure to perform that statutory duty an action will lie by the person injured against the person who has failed to perform the duty unless it appears from the whole purview of the statute that the legislature intended that the only remedy for a breach of the duty created by the Act should be a penalty imposed by the Act. In determining this question, the fact that the remedy given by the statute is to enure for the benefit of the person injured is a cogent and weighty fact to be taken into account, but the nature of the duty imposed by the Act, the nature of the injuries likely to be caused by a breach of the duty, the amount of the penalty to be imposed, and the person on whom it is imposed have also to be considered.

A workman employed in a factory was injured through a breach of the duty, imposed on the occupier of the factory by s. 5 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, of securely fencing dangerous machinery in the factory.

Held: an action would lie by the workman to recover from the occupier damages for breach of his statutory duty.

Notes. The Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, and the amending Act of 1891 have been repealed. The equivalent sections to ss. 5 and 86 of the Act of 1878, as amended are now ss. 14 and 155 (2) of the Factories Act, 1961: 41 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 239. Section 82 of the Act of 1878 was re-enacted by the Factories Act, 1937, s. 133, but that section was repealed by the Factories Act, 1959, and not re-enacted.

Appeal from the decision of GRANTHAM, J., at the trial of the action with a jury.

The plaintiff, a boy of fifteen years of age, was employed at the Dowlais Iron Works, near Cardiff, which was a "factory" within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, the defendant being the "occupier" within the meaning of the Act. On July 21, 1896, the plaintiff was at work at a steam winch, and, there being, on that day, no efficient fencing of the machinery, his hand was caught between the cogs of two of the wheels, and he was injured. By his statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that the defendant, in breach of his statutory duty, did not securely or at all fence the dangerous part of the machinery, but allowed it to remain in an unfenced condition, whereby the damage complained of was caused to the plaintiff, and, alternatively, that the defendant had negligently and improperly allowed the steam winch to be and remain out of repair and defective, so as to be dangerous to the plaintiff lawfully using the same at the request of the defendant. The defendant pleaded (inter alia) that no action lay for any breach of his statutory duty under the Factory Acts, and that an efficient guard had been provided for the steam winch, the absence of which, at the time of the accident, was due to the negligence of a fellow workman with the plaintiff in the same common employment, and that the foreman entrusted with the duty of superintending the said machinery was a fit and proper person for that purpose. At the trial before GRANTHAM, J., with a jury, the learned judge was of opinion that the provisions of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, which were relied on by the plaintiff, should be looked upon as a private legislative bargain with the people working in factories, and he held that an action could not be maintained for a statutory wrong under that Act. He, therefore, gave judgment for the defendant, but in case it should be held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover in the action he left to the jury the question of the damages which the plaintiff might be entitled to, and the jury gave a verdict for £150. From this decision the plaintiff now appealed.

By the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, as amended by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891 :

“Section 5. With respect to the fencing of machinery in a factory the following provisions shall have effect. . . . (3) All dangerous parts of the machinery and every part of the mill gearing shall either be securely fenced or be in such position or of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed in the factory as it would be if it were securely fenced; and (4) All fencing shall be constantly maintained in an efficient state while the parts required to be fenced are in motion. . . .

“Section 82. If any person is killed or suffers any bodily injury in consequence of the occupier of a factory having neglected to fence any machinery required by or in pursuance of this Act to be securely fenced, or having neglected to maintain such fencing . . . the occupier of the factory or workshop shall be liable to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds, the whole or any part of which may be applied for the benefit of the injured person or his family, or otherwise as a Secretary of State determines.

“Section 86. Where an offence for which the occupier of a factory or workshop is liable under this Act to a fine, has in fact been committed by some agent, servant, workman, or other person, such agent, servant, workman, or other person shall be liable to the same fine as if he were the occupier.”

Section 87 gave power to the occupier to exempt himself from fine on conviction of the actual offender.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an action brought against the occupier of the Dowlais ironworks, founded upon a breach of the defendant's statutory duty to fence certain machinery at the works, by reason of which breach of duty the plaintiff, in the course of his employment there, suffered personal injuries. At the trial of the action GRANTHAM, J., gave judgment for the defendant upon the ground that no action would lie for the breach of the statutory duty alleged by the plaintiff.

By the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, certain duties as to fencing machinery are cast upon the occupiers of factories. In imposing these duties that Act has followed the principles of many previous Acts relating to factories and workshops. It is a public Act passed to compel the occupiers of factories to take certain precautions on behalf of their workmen. It is not, as the learned judge at the trial thought it was, in the nature of a private legislative bargain between masters and men, but a legislative enactment in compulsion of the masters. Let us now consider what are the duties imposed by this Act upon occupiers of factories with regard to fencing machinery. Section 5 makes certain provisions “with respect to the fencing of machinery in a factory,” and by sub-s. (3) as amended by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, s. 6 (2) :

“All dangerous parts of the machinery and every part of the mill-gearing shall either be securely fenced or be in such position or of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed in the factory as it would be if it were securely fenced.”

By sub-s. (4):

"All fencing shall be constantly maintained in an efficient state while the parts required to be fenced are in motion."

In the present case it is conceded that the machinery which caused the injury to the plaintiff was not fenced as required by the Act. Proof that there had been a breach of the statutory duty to fence imposed on the defendant, and that the plaintiff had been thereby injured would prima facie establish the plaintiff's cause of action.

Assuming that the matter depended on s. 5 alone, and that ss. 81, 82, and 86 had formed no part of the Act, could it be doubted that a person injured as the plaintiff has been could sue for the damage caused to him by the breach of the statutory duty imposed on the defendant? Clearly not. Therefore, unless it can be found from the whole purview of the Act that the legislature intended that the only remedy for a breach of the duty created by the Act should be the infliction of a fine upon the master, it seems clear to me that upon proof of such a breach of duty and of an injury done to the workman, a cause of action is given to the workman against the master.

That brings me to the question whether the cause of action which would prima facie be given by the Act has been taken away by any of the provisions enacted in the statute. Reliance has been placed upon ss. 81, 82, and 86, and it has been argued that, under these sections, the only remedy provided in a case where a workman has been injured by a breach of a duty imposed upon the master by the Act is an application to a court of summary jurisdiction for the infliction of a fine. In considering this question, I ask myself in whose favour was the Act passed? As was pointed out by KELLY, C.B., in Gorris v. Scott (1) the purposes which the legislature had in view in passing the Act are very material. I feel no doubt that the Act was passed for the benefit of workmen in factories, by compelling the masters to do certain things for their protection. I do not think that ss. 81, 82, and 86 can be interpreted so as to take away from an injured workman the remedy which otherwise he would have under the statute against his master. Not one penny of a fine imposed under these sections need ever go into the pocket of the person injured. It is only when a Secretary of State so determines that any part of the fine is to be applied for the benefit of the injured workman. I cannot think that such an enactment was intended to deprive the workman of his right of action. Moreover, upon what grounds are the magistrates to whom application has been made under these sections to estimate the amount of the fine to be imposed? Suppose that a workman has been killed in consequence of a breach of the master's statutory duty to fence his machinery, should the fine be of the same amount whether the breach of duty was a flagrant one or not? It is contended that the magistrates ought to take into consideration the nature of the injury which the workman has suffered, but I do not feel at all clear that that is what the legislature intended by these sections. I am inclined to think that the object of these provisions is the infliction of punishment on the master who has neglected his duty, and that the fine should be in proportion to his offence. The consideration of these points leads me to the conclusion that it was not the intention of the legislature to take away by means of these sections the right which the workman would otherwise have to be properly compensated for any injury caused to him by his master's neglect of duty.

There is also another ground which I should have mentioned which supports me in arriving at that conclusion. It is this. There is no necessity that the fine inflicted under these sections should be payable by the master, who would presumably be a man of some means. Under ss. 86 and 87 the fine may be imposed upon the actual offender, and it is provided that the master may then obtain exemption from the penalty. The actual offender may be a workman earning weekly wages, and yet it is said that the infliction of a fine on him is to be the only remedy that the injured person is to have. I cannot read this statute in the way in which the defendant seeks to read it. In my opinion, s. 5 gives to a workman a right of action upon the statute, when he has been injured through a breach of the duties created by the statute, and his rights of compensation are not limited by the provisions of the Act with regard to a fine that may be imposed by a court of summary jurisdiction.

A great many cases were cited in the course of the argument, but out of all those decided from the time of the Factory Act, 1844, down to the present day, there is not one which shows that an action will not lie by a workman injured by a breach of a statutory duty. There are, however, two cases much in point which are opposed to the defendant's contention. One is Britton v. Great Western Cotton Co. (2) which, I think, covers the present case. The breach of duty in that case was the neglect to provide fencing for machinery, while in the present case the breach consists in neglecting to maintain the fencing, but I do not think there is any substantial difference between the two cases. Then there is the Scottish case of Kelly v. Glebe Sugar Refining Co. (3) which, of course is not binding upon this court, but is directly in the plaintiff's favour. Taking into consideration the matters I have mentioned, I am clearly of opinion that the plaintiff had a good cause of action against the defendant so far as the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, is concerned.

[His LORDSHIP then held that the defence of common employment, abolished by the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act, 1948, was not available in an action for a breach of a statutory duty incumbent on the defendant, and concluded:] In my opinion the appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the £150 damages assessed by the jury.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree in all that has been said by A. L. SMITH, L.J. The only question we have to decide arises on the true construction of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878. The question is whether, having regard to the whole purview of the Act, the clauses providing penalties for a breach of the statutory duties created by the Act are the only ones under which a remedy can be obtained for any such breach.

Section 5 throws on the occupier of a factory or workshop an absolute and unqualified duty to fence dangerous machinery, and to maintain such fencing when placed in position. When a statute throws a duty upon a certain person, he cannot cast that duty upon someone else so as to escape the liability he is under for a breach of the provisions of the Act, on the ground that the other person was negligent. [His LORDSHIP referred to the doctrine of common employment and continued:] It is now established that the breach of a statutory duty will give a right of action to the person injured unless the case can be brought within some known exception to the rule, such as where, when a new right or duty has been created by the statute, and a new specific remedy is given at the same time to the person injured in such a way that from the purview of the whole Act it appears plain that the new remedy is intended to be substituted for the cause of action which would otherwise exist. If a plaintiff is driven to allege negligence on the part of the defendant, and cannot prove it otherwise than by showing negligence of a servant of the defendant, such a cause of action may sometimes be met by a plea founded on the doctrine of common employment. But there is no need here for the plaintiff to allege negligence on the part of the defendant. The action is founded upon an alleged breach of a statutory duty imposed on the defendant. The doctrine of common employment can afford no defence here.

Let me now come to the question of the true construction of this Act of Parliament for that seems to me to be really the only point in the case before us. Looking at the purview of the Act, is it an Act which declares in the interests of the general public that a certain line of conduct is to be followed and any deviation from it shall be punishable by fine, but that no one shall have any private right of action for damages caused to him by any such deviation, or is it one which creates a new duty, and at the same time provides a statutory remedy with the intention that no other remedy shall be available? In my opinion, it is neither one nor the other. The plaintiff in this case was unquestionably one of the class of persons for whose protection s. 5 was enacted. The question then arises whether we ought to come to the conclusion that the legislature intended the provisions with regard to the imposition of fines to be the only remedy for a breach of the statutory duties created by the Act. I think it is impossible to come to any such conclusion. The maximum fine that can be imposed in any one case is only £100, whether the breach of duty causes the death of the workman or only a slight injury to him. The legislature could not have seriously intended that whether the workman suffer death or mutilation the liability of the master should never exceed £100. Moreover, whatever the fine may amount to, there is no provision in the Act that the injured person or his relatives shall be benefited by it. Section 82 only provides that the Secretary of State may, if he thinks fit, order that the fine or some part of it shall be applied for the benefit of the injured person or his family. Again take the case of a very trifling injury being caused to a workman through a gross and deliberate neglect by a master of his duties under the Act. Are the justices to estimate the amount of the fine by the smallness of the damage? Or should they not take into consideration the way in which the employer has deliberately refused to comply with the requirements of the Act, and upon this ground inflict a fine of large amount? On the other hand, the offence may be a comparatively venial one though the damage resulting from it may be great. Should the magistrates inflict a heavy fine upon a defendant who has been most anxious to perform his duty under the Act, but has been guilty of some small oversight or technical violation of duty? In such a case it seems to me that only a small fine should be imposed, but yet it is contended that the workman could not possibly obtain as compensation anything more than this small fine. Again, under s. 87, the occupier may show that he has used due diligence and that his failure to comply with the Act has arisen from the negligence of some other person, and he may under this section escape liability and throw the responsibility on the person who has been guilty of negligence. If that person is a mere workman who would be unable to pay the fine the compensation recovered by the injured person would be reduced to nothing.

Taking the whole Act together I cannot agree with the argument that the penalties recoverable under the Act were intended by the legislature to be the only remedies for damage caused by a breach of the statutory duties created by the Act. For these reasons I think that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree in the conclusion at which my learned brethren have arrived. I entertain no doubt that, upon the proper construction of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, it cannot be said that the legislature intended the remedy or benefit which may be given through the intervention of the Secretary of State to a person injured through a breach of the provisions of the Act as to fencing dangerous machinery should be the only remedy open to a person so injured. I also feel no doubt that the doctrine of common employment affords no defence to the action, but I wish to add a few words on both these points.

With regard to the first point, I think it cannot even be doubted that, when a statute provides for the performance by a certain person of a particular duty, and someone for whose protection the statute was passed is injured by a failure to perform that statutory duty, then, there being nothing more to the contrary, an action will lie by the person so injured against the person who has failed to perform the duty. I have equally no doubt that when in a statute of this sort a remedy is provided in cases of non-performance of the statutory duty, that is a matter to be taken into consideration in determining the question whether or not the remedy provided by the statute was intended by the legislature to be the only remedy available in cases of breach of the statutory duty. But that is by no means conclusive, nor the only matter to be taken into consideration. If the remedy given by the statute is to enure for the benefit of the person injured, that is an additional matter which ought to be taken into consideration when deciding the question whether or not the statutory remedy was intended by the legislature to be the only remedy. But again, the fact that the remedy was intended by the legislature to enure for the benefit of the person injured is not conclusive of the matter; and, although it may be a cogent and weighty fact, other things have also to be considered. As was said by LORD CAIRNS in Atkinson v. Newcastle Water-works Co. (4), one must look at the general scope of the Act and the nature of the duty imposed by the statute. One must look also at the nature of the injuries likely to be caused by a breach of the statutory duties, the amount of the penalty to be imposed, and the person on whom it is imposed, before any proper determination can be arrived at whether the remedy provided by the statute was intended to be the only remedy available in case of a breach of the statutory duties.

I have nothing to add to the observations of my Lord on the provisions of s. 87, which in some cases substitute a servant in the place of the master as the person who is to be liable to the fine imposed under the Act. I agree also with the observations of my brother RIGBY as to the improbability of the £100 fine being the only remedy for a breach of duty which might result in the death or serious injury of a person of the class intended to be benefited by the Act. For these reasons I entirely agree that, upon the true construction of the Act, it is impossible that the legislature intended the penalty provided for in s. 82 should be the only remedy in case of a breach of the duties created by the statute. But though I agree in this, I at the same time think that the point is one by no means free from difficulty. I am not at present aware of any instance in which it has been held that when a statute in terms provides that a penalty unpaid under it shall go to the person injured by a breach of the statutory duty, there is a civil remedy available besides the remedy provided by the Act. However, we have not got to decide that point now, because this Act does not direct that any part of the fine shall go to the person injured. Section 82 merely enables the Secretary of State if he thinks fit to order that the fine or a part of it, shall be applied to the benefit of the injured person. I will only add this remark, that I do not wish to go back in the slightest degree from the general proposition that no hard-and-fast line can be drawn as to what will indicate whether the legislature intended, in the case of any particular statute, that the remedy created by the statute in case of a breach of a statutory duty should be the only available remedy. In each case the whole statute, with all its provisions, must be looked at to see what was the real intention of the legislature. This view of the matter has been very clearly laid down by STEPHEN and MATHEW, J.J., in Vallance v. Falle (5). [HIS LORDSHIP then said that in the present case it was impossible to set up the defence of common employment, and concluded:] I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Charity—Uncertainty—Gift for “some one or more purposes charitable, philanthropic, or [a blank]”

A testator by his will gave £10,000 to be appropriated and allocated “for some one or more purposes charitable, philanthropic, or [a blank]”

Held: on the true construction of the will the £10,000 was to be appropriated and allocated for some purpose or purposes which was, or were, charitable or philanthropic; the meaning of “philanthropic” was uncertain and not confined to that which was “charitable”; therefore, it was possible for the gift to be applied to other than strictly charitable purposes, and so it was invalid.

I Appeal by the Crown from a decision of STIRLING, J., on an originating summons taken out by the plaintiff, Annie Seton Macduff, against the trustees of the will of her father, John Ross Macduff, and the Attorney-General to determine whether a bequest in the will "for some one or more purposes charitable or philanthropic or [a blank]" was valid. STIRLING, J., held that the gift was invalid for uncertainty.

I The Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.) and Ingle Joyce for the Crown. Hadley for the plaintiff and the trustees of the will.

LINDLEY, L.J.—We have arrived at the conclusion that the judgment of STIRLING, J., is right. The case is a difficult one, and it arises from the language used in the will of a testator who left his property to his daughter for her life and executed the following document, which was admitted to probate along with the will.

and then there is a blank. He goes on,

"The precise purpose or purposes I would desire to be named by my daughter, Annie S. Macduff, but should she from any cause fail, or be unable to indicate these, I leave the elder surviving sons of my brothers, in co-operation with any others in whose wisdom and experience they can thoroughly rely, to see my wishes carried into effect. I am unable personally to tie myself down to any specific scheme, as many objects supremely claimant today may cease to be so after a series of years, while others at present undreamt of may be found urgent."

The question which we have to consider is: What is the effect of those clauses? On the one hand, it is said that, notwithstanding the generality of this language, this sum of £10,000 is appropriated for general charitable purposes, and if so, of course, a scheme can be directed. On the other hand, it is said, and the learned judge has taken that view, that the clause is too general, too uncertain, and too vague to amount to a valid charitable bequest, and the disposition of the £10,000, therefore, fails. Without going through the cases which have been decided, it appears to me that the first point to be considered is what is the effect of the blank? We have here a will which contains the expression, "For some one or more purposes charitable, philanthropic or ——" At first I was disposed to think that that alone made the purpose of the testator too indefinite to be treated as a charitable bequest at all, but on re-consideration, and on looking into the authorities and observing that there was a similar blank in Re White, White v. White (1), I have come to the conclusion that the learned judge was right on that point, and that the true construction of this clause is, to put it shortly, that the £10,000 is to be appropriated and allocated for some purpose charitable or philanthropic. That gets over the first difficulty, and I am not prepared to dissent from the view taken by the learned judge on that point. On the contrary, I think he is right, having regard to the authorities which we have been referred to, especially Re White, White v. White (1).

Having got over that difficulty, the question is: What is the meaning of these words? The first point to observe is that there is nothing definite here at all. It is all indefinite. It is not a gift to some specific institution or for some specific object with additional words. There is no context here except this, that the £10,000 is to be appropriated and allocated for some one or more purposes charitable or philanthropic, with the additional clause that the testator says,

"I am unable personally to tie myself down to any specific scheme, as many objects supremely claimant to-day may cease to be so after a series of years, while others at present undreamt of may be found urgent."

That is all we have got to guide us.

In dealing with these general bequests—bequests framed in general language like this—without any context to help one, what has one to get at in order to hold such a general indeterminate bequest to be valid? You must get at this—I shall show presently from the language used by LORD ELDON that the doctrine is quite old—you must get at something sufficiently definite to guide the court as to the kind of trust which it has to execute. It must be of the kind called technically a charitable trust. I am bound to say that, having considered these words and attended to the arguments upon them, I cannot arrive at any definite idea at all of what this testator meant, or of the kind of trust which the court would have to execute. To show that that is the right principle I will refer to what I always consider the leading case on all these questions as to charities, I mean Morice v. Bishop of

Durham (2). In that case, which came first before SIR WILLIAM GRANT and subsequently before LORD ELDON (whose judgment is one of the most important upon all questions of charities), LORD ELDON incidentally remarks (10 Ves. at p. 538) what unquestionably is true, that this court "has taken strong liberties upon this subject of charity." There is no doubt it has, but, notwithstanding the strong liberties it has taken, there are certain principles which have always guided the court. LORD ELDON said in that case (ibid. at p. 539):

"As it is a maxim that the execution of a trust shall be under the control of the court, it must be of such a nature that it can be under that control, so that the administration of it can be reviewed by the court; or, if the trustee dies, the court itself can execute the trust, a trust therefore, which in case of mal-administration could be reformed, and a due administration directed; and then, unless the subject and the objects can be ascertained, upon principles familiar in other cases, it must be decided that the court can neither reform mal-administration nor direct a due administration."

That principle has been enunciated or repeated from time to time, as will be found on reference to James v. Allen (3) and Ellis v. Selby (4). Therefore, when we are dealing with general words, we must see whether there is such an indication of purpose or of trust which the court is to be called upon to execute that the court can see what it has to do, that is to say, see the limits of its own powers.

That brings us to this question of "charitable or philanthropic." "Charitable," I suppose, is there used in the popular sense. I do not suppose that this gentleman, who was a clergyman, used the word "charitable" in the very wide and indefinite sense in which it is used in courts of equity. I do not suppose there is one man in a thousand who understands what that sense is, and the sense itself is an uncommonly indefinite one, as I shall have occasion to show presently. I take it that the testator here uses the word "charitable" in the ordinary popular sense, which is not a very definite sense. Then what is the meaning of the word "philanthropic"? He means by that something distinguished from "charitable" in the ordinary sense, but what he does mean by "philanthropic" is uncommonly vague. I cannot put any definite meaning to that word. All I can say is, that a philanthropic purpose must be a purpose which indicates goodwill to mankind in general. Can anything be looser than that? And here arises the difficulty of which the Attorney-General has availed himself with great skill. He says: "What philanthropic purpose is not charitable?" My answer is: You are dealing with two words of so vague a meaning that it is extremely difficult to say, but I can suggest purposes which might be philanthropic and not charitable, and those would be purposes indicating goodwill to rich men to the exclusion of poor men. I will not go into instances, but I take it they would be philanthropic in the ordinary acceptance of the word—that is to say, in the wide loose sense of indicating some goodwill towards mankind, or a great portion of them—but I do not think that would be charitable. I am quite aware that a trust may be charitable, and yet not be confined to the poor, but I doubt very much whether a trust would be declared to be charitable which excluded the poor. One can suggest trusts which might be philanthropic, but which would not be charitable. I repeat, I do not know with anything like certainty what is meant by "philanthropic," and not knowing what is meant by "philanthropic," it follows that the trustees of this will could apply this £10,000 to purposes which might or might not be charitable in the technical sense of that expression.

If so, this general disposition cannot be upheld as a charitable bequest. On that point again I return to Morice v. Bishop of Durham (2), where LORD ELDON says (10 Ves. at p. 541):

"The question then is entirely, whether this is according to the intention a gift to purposes of charity in general, as understood in this court, such that this court would have held the bishop bound, and would have compelled him to apply the surplus to such charitable purposes as can be answered only in obedience to decrees, where the gift is to charity in general; or is it, or may it be according to the intention, to such purposes going beyond those, partially or altogether, which the court understands by 'charitable purposes'; and, if that is the intention, is the gift too indefinite to create an effectual trust to be here executed? The argument has not denied, nor is it necessary, in order to support this decree, that the person created the trustee might give the property to such charitable uses as this court holds charitable uses within the ordinary meaning. It is not contended, and it is not necessary, to support this decree, to contend that the trustee might not consistently with the intention have devoted every shilling to uses in that sense charitable, and, of course, a part of the property. But the true question is, whether, if, on the one hand, he might have devoted the whole to purposes in this sense charitable, he might not equally according to the intention have devoted the whole to purposes benevolent and liberal, and yet not within the meaning of charitable purposes, as this court construes those words; and, if according to the intention it was competent to him to do so, I do apprehend that under any authority upon such words the court could have charged him with mal-administration if he had applied the whole to purposes which, according to the meaning of the testator are benevolent and liberal, though not acts of that species of benevolence and liberality which this court in the construction of a will calls charitable acts."

I take it that that principle is as sound now as it was when LORD ELDON announced it. He did not announce it for the first time, and certainly there was nothing said or dropped from the court in Re White, White v. White (1), which in any way trenches upon that principle. Re White (1) has been referred to as if it authorised the view that this gift might be upheld, even if some of these philanthropic purposes might not be charitable. That is not a correct view of Re White (1). That was a curious and a difficult case. There was a bequest "to the following religious societies," and then there was a blank. At first sight one would say it would be very difficult to uphold that as a valid charitable bequest, but when the authorities were looked into, it was found that it had been decided, not once, but several times, that a bequest for religious purposes was a charitable bequest, and, therefore, the court had to face that as a rule which was settled. Then came the difficulty that the bequest was not even a bequest to religious purposes; it was only a bequest to religious societies, and it was argued that the purpose was indefinite. But upon consideration the court came to the conclusion, rightly or wrongly (it does not matter now), that the bequest to religious societies purported to be a bequest to religious purposes, and having got that far they held that this was a good and valid bequest for charitable purposes. That case does not show, however, that it was competent for the trustees of the fund to apply that fund to religious purposes which were not charitable. They had no option at all about the matter. The question was the true construction of the words "religious societies."

Reliance is placed, and very naturally placed, upon the judgment of LORD MACNAGHTEN in Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs. v. Pemsel (5), but when we look at that I do not think it helps the Attorney-General in this case. What LORD MACNAGHTEN did is tolerably plain. He took the classification of charities from the argument of SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY in Morice v. Bishop of Durham (2), and the passage in SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY's argument runs thus (10 Ves. at p. 531): "There are four objects, within one of which all charity to be administered in this court must fall." That is to say, within one of which they must come, but he does not say that anything which comes within any one of them must be a charity; that may be so or may not be so, but they must all come within one of these four heads. He continues:

“First, relief of the indigent in various ways, money, provisions, education, medical assistance, etc.; secondly, the advancement of learning; thirdly, the advancement of religion; and fourthly, which is the most difficult, the advancement of objects of general public utility.”

SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY did not mean, and I am certain LORD MACNAGHTEN did not mean, in the passage I will read presently, to say that anything that was an object of public general utility must necessarily be a charity. Some may be and some may not be. That is the true view and true explanation of LORD LANGDALE’S decision in Kendall v. Granger (6), where the gift was “for encouraging undertakings of general utility,” and LORD LANGDALE came to the conclusion that that was not necessarily a charity. I am not aware that Kendall v. Granger (6) has ever been overruled or questioned.

What LORD MACNAGHTEN said in Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs. v. Pemsel (5) is obviously a paraphrase of what SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY said. LORD MACNAGHTEN said ([1891] A.C. at p. 583):

“‘Charity’ in its legal sense comprises four principal divisions: trusts for the relief of poverty; trusts for the advancement of education; trusts for the advancement of religion; and trusts for other purposes beneficial to the community, not falling under any of the preceding heads.”

He leaves out those somewhat significant words which SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY put in in dealing with the fourth head, “which is the most difficult,” which showed perfectly plainly that SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY saw, and I do not doubt but LORD MACNAGHTEN saw also, there might be cases of public general utility which might be charitable and some which might not. In deciding that, we must fall back upon the Statute of Elizabeth [Charitable Uses Act, 1601], not upon the strict or narrow words of it, but upon what has been called the spirit of it, or the intention of it. As LORD ELDON says, this court has taken great liberties with charities, but the liberty is always restricted by falling back, or professing to fall back, upon the Statute of Elizabeth.

Turning to the present case, can we fairly get out of these words any direction that this £10,000 is to be applied, and applied only, to such purposes as the law says is a charity? My answer is “No.” The words are too general and too indefinite, and I think the learned judge was perfectly right, and this appeal, therefore, must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The important words in this will are these:

and then there is a blank. I read those words in this way: “I, John Ross Macduff, will from my estate the entire sum of £10,000, to be appropriated and allocated for some one or more purposes charitable or philanthropic,” and I take it that in all probability the words which it was contemplated would be inserted in that blank would be some other purpose to be indicated hereafter by him in any codicil he might make. I think that was the view taken by STIRLING, J., and with that view I entirely agree.

Very great liberties have been taken with the Statute of Elizabeth, as has been justly said, and a signification attributed to the word “charity” very much larger than ever was intended by that statute, and there have been numbers of decisions on that point which it is no doubt difficult to reconcile. The difficulty in this case arises from the use of the word “philanthropic,” a word dealt with, so far as I am aware and have been informed, in no previous decision. It has been argued by the learned Attorney-General that the word "philanthropic" here is synonymous with "charitable," and that it means nothing more than "charitable," and that it must be construed in the same sense that "charitable" would be construed. I cannot adopt that view. I think we must insert the word "or" between charitable and philanthropic. I cannot help thinking that the testator intended to draw a distinction between the word "charitable" and the word "philanthropic." If the will stopped at the word "charitable," I presume that that would have been a good gift, but it does not stop there. There is in addition the word "philanthropic," and that is the word with which in this will we have to deal.

The principle applicable to this case is not in dispute, and cannot be in dispute. I adopt the words of SIR WILLIAM GRANT in James v. Allen (3), where he says (3 Mer. at p. 19):

"The whole property might, consistently with the words of the will, have been applied to purposes strictly charitable. But the question is, what authority would this court have to say that the property must not be applied to purposes, however so benevolent, unless they also come within the technical denomination of charitable purposes? If it might, consistently with the will, be applied to other than strictly charitable purposes, the trust is too indefinite for the court to execute."

Looking at those words, I ask myself whether or not the property might not, consistently with the will, having regard to the word "philanthropic," be applied to other than strictly charitable purposes, and I feel compelled to answer that question in the affirmative. It has been said that nothing can be suggested, no purpose and no object can be suggested, which would come within the meaning of the word "philanthropic" which is not also a charity. If that were so, I think the argument of the Attorney-General could be maintained; but that is not a view that I am able to adopt in regard to that word. I think I could suggest many objects which would come within the word "philanthropic," and to which the trustees would be entitled to apply the money, which are not charitable. I will not again allude to recreation grounds and grounds devoted to sport, which are not for the poorer classes, but are generally for the rich and poor alike. I think that would be a case; but there is an illustration which has occurred to me which seems not to be inapplicable to this case. For instance, a gift to landowners affected by agricultural depression, whose incomes are reduced to the amount of £300 a year. It appears to me that that is an object which clearly would be philanthropic, but at the same time would not be charitable. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the words used in this will are too wide and too indefinite to support the gift, and I agree with the judgment which has been delivered by STIRLING, J.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. With reference to the blank I have very little to say, but I am inclined to think that the proper way of looking at it is that where a man leaves a blank in a will and does not choose to fill it up at the time when he executes it, it must be taken that he has deliberately determined not to fill it up, but has left the court to deal with the construction of the instrument as it is found, and that it cannot be properly suggested that he intended to do what we all know would be a perfectly useless thing, namely, to fill up the blank at some time after execution. I treat this as a gift to charitable or philanthropic purposes.

The cases with regard to charities are innumerable, but in the case of charities, as in all other cases, precedents are only useful in so far as they enable us to deduce a principle. No previous will can be treated properly as a precedent for another which is expressed in different language, and no decision on the precise words of a former will can, as a general rule, be of the least service in guiding the court as to the construction of other words. Unless you can get a principle from a case which is applicable generally to other cases the precedent is of little use. What principle do we find that is really applicable to a whole class of cases? First of all, a bequest must be sufficiently certain to enable the old Court of Chancery, or this court as succeeding the old Court of Chancery, to superintend and give effect to the trust according to its terms. So far we have nothing to do with charity. That is a general principle that applies to all bequests; they must be sufficiently definite to enable the court to draw the line, and say this matter is within and that matter is outside it. How do charity cases differ from general cases? As it appears to me in this respect only, that when you get the idea of charity properly expressed in a will you have a standard to go by, and one that has been adopted now for centuries—that is to say, a standard afforded by the preamble of the Statute of Elizabeth, which deals with certain things specifically as instances of existing charities, and from which by analogy you can deduce other matters which are also to be treated as charitable. But before you can apply that rule at all you must have the idea of charity sufficiently expressed in the will, and it will not do if there is any alternative (I am now talking of substantial matters) allowed to trustees as to whether the purposes to which they apply the property which is demised to them are to be charitable or something else. Directly there is an alternative the reference to the statute is of no service, and the general rule comes in that it is too indefinite for the court to give effect to it.

What is the present case? It is a gift to charitable or philanthropic purposes. I am bound to say that I do not think it is very different to a gift for philanthropic purposes. There may be an argument that, being joined with the word charitable, it must be purposes which are charitable also; but then there is also another argument, that as “philanthropic” is distinguished from “charitable” it shows that “philanthropic purposes” are to be those which are not charitable. I think the one may be set off against the other, and you can get very little assistance from the fact that the word “charitable” is used together with the word “philanthropic.” Suppose the word “philanthropic” stood alone, I am quite sure that as yet no court has defined that word, because, as we know, the case has never come before any court for decision, but suppose we try now to define it. I confess myself unable to do so, at any rate in any sense which would show that the definition meant the same thing as “charitable.” I do not wish to attempt any very precise illustration, but I am inclined to think that a very general illustration may be of service. I can suppose the case of a person in effect saying: “The ordinary objects of charity are in my mind sufficiently provided for, but I regard the position of the well-to-do or moderately well-to-do classes as one also requiring consideration, and I leave my residue to trustees in order that they may in their discretion do something towards advancing the happiness and the position in life of those who are not really objects of charity, but who may be made happier and in some sense better than they now are upon such incomes as they possess.” I doubt whether anyone could say that that was not a philanthropic intention, a very wide desire to improve the position of a large class of persons. Philanthropic, I should think it was; charitable, I feel pretty certain it would not be; and so we get to the conclusion that the word “philanthropic” may include, not only cases of a totally exceptional character, but cases of a very wide class indeed, and numerous cases which would be within the popular meaning of “philanthropic,” and would have nothing to do with charity at all.

It appears to me that that is sufficient to decide the case. I will not go into any examination of the authorities, but I will refer to one or two of them as showing that the matter has come under the consideration of learned judges, and that the decisions have been in accordance with what I conceive to be the principle which I have endeavoured to express. There is Kendall v. Granger (6), which included purposes of “general utility,” and LORD LANGDALE, a great authority in cases of this kind, thought that was not sufficient and that there were purposes, or might be purposes, of general utility which were not charitable purposes. That was his view, and I see no reason to doubt that, and I do not know that that case has ever been doubted. I consider it an authority for that purpose. I will take the case to which I think counsel for the plaintiff very properly referred us, notwithstanding the doubts which have been thrown upon the application of the principle in that particular case, I mean Browne v. Yeall (7). That appears to be a case in which the question considered by LORD THURLOW was whether a gift for the purchase and disposition of books for the happiness of mankind was sufficiently definite, and I consider that LORD THURLOW, as explained by LORD ELDON, came to the conclusion that a gift of that kind (and he treated it as a gift for the happiness of mankind) would not be so definite as to be capable of being administered as a charitable gift. It is true that in that will there were words which I should have thought gave a limitation to the words "happiness of mankind," and that is what I understand to have been the view taken by LORD ELDON. It was on the question whether the words "happiness of mankind" were sufficiently definite that LORD THURLOW decided the case, and I do not gather that LORD ELDON or SIR WILLIAM GRANT would have differed if that case was really raised by the will. The promotion of the happiness of mankind no one would doubt to be a philanthropic purpose, and I think that the learned counsel was right in saying, so far, at any rate, as the cases have been brought before us, that "happiness of mankind" is nearer in its meaning to that of the word philanthropic than any other.

There is one other case which I should like to refer to, and that is Whicker v. Hume (8) and in doing so I will refer also to President of United States v. Drummond (9), which is there mentioned. I say nothing about the wide extent of the gift in Whicker v. Hume (8), because that is beyond question. There is no doubt now that the extensive nature of the gift as regards the range of the objects was no objection to it, but the gift was for the advancement of learning, and counsel who were impeaching the validity of the gift raised an objection to it of this nature. Education is no doubt a charitable purpose within the statute, learning is not—that is to say, learning or the promotion of abstract learning would not be a charitable purpose. That was dealt with by LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C., and by LORD CRANWORTH, and they point out that, reading the word "learning" as you find it in that will in connection with "education," it must mean the advancement of learning as equivalent to teaching, and, therefore, as a branch of education, and I gather from their opinions and from the pains which they took to elucidate the meaning of the word "learning" in that will, that, if they could not have put that interpretation upon it, they would have doubted, at any rate, whether the advancement of learning as an abstract matter would be a charity at all. The Lord Chancellor deals with that point more particularly. He goes with great pains into the matter, and says that the gift was for "education" and for "learning" in the sense of teaching and instruction,

"and in that sense it appears to me that the case which was cited by the respondents and was printed in the respondents' case, of the President of United States v. Drummond (9) may be applicable."

It is important to see what the gift was. It appears that it was a gift of residue to found at Washington, under the name of the Smithsonean Institution, an establishment for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men. LORD LANGDALE held that it was a valid charitable gift.

I have now only to deal with the supposed difficulty arising from the judgment of LORD MACNAGHTEN in Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs. v. Pemsel (5), and I think it is altogether illogical to ascribe to LORD MACNAGHTEN what is ascribed to him. He says that cases of charity may be divided into four classes, and one of them is benefit to the community. There is one miscellaneous set of charities which can be classed under that head; but to deduce from that that every purpose of general use to the community must be a charity, is just about as logical as if an assurance society for the purposes of its reports says, "Persons insured with us may be divided into men, women, and children." Are you to deduce from that that every man, every woman, and every child is insured in that society?

I have only one word to say about Re White, White v. White (1) which has been referred to. I consider that the court was there constrained by the authorities to say that "religious" was equivalent to "charitable," not in the sense that there could be no charities which are not religious, but that religious purposes were all charitable; and, although it was suggested that in Cocks v. Manners (10) it had been shown that a gift to a particular religious society in the terms in which it was given was not a charity, that, to my mind, makes no difficulty at all, because, as far as I know, and for the purpose, at any rate, of this case, I think it is true that when you say: "Gifts to the poor, trusts for the advancement of education, trusts for the advancement of religion, are charities," that does not mean that in every conceivable case where you can bring a gift under one or other of those general words it is necessarily a charity. It means nothing of the kind. It means, as in the case of "for the general benefit of the community," that these are heads or categories under which actual and valid charities may be implied. No one will suggest, for instance, to take only one illustration, that "education" meant the education of pickpockets in a thieves' kitchen to make them fit for their profession. It must be education of a particular kind, and when there is a gift to a religious society you may in the same way say it must not necessarily be taken to be a charity because there may be a religious society, as there was in Cocks v. Manners (10), which does not attempt to promote religion. The convent in that case was a set of religious people who met together, but who abstained even from good works as regards the outside public, did not attempt to proselytise, or to attend to the sick or the poor, and it was held that under the peculiar circumstances of that case, while it might be a religious society, it could not be called a charity. It was only a gift to particular men and women who happened at the particular moment to form part of the society. I do not consider that Re White, White v. White (1) laid down in any way any new law, and I do not think LORD MACNAGHTEN's classification of charities lays down any new law whatever. That being so, I think that the cases which have been referred to show that you must have an object sufficiently definite and sufficiently having a charitable meaning according to the standard supplied by the Statute of Elizabeth, and by the analogies of the statute. In my mind, the word "philanthropic" is too wide altogether, and the judgment of STIRLING, J., must be affirmed.

Libel—Action—Trial—Question for judge—Whether words complained of capable of being defamatory—Publication to be regarded as a whole—Test of opinion of ordinary reasonable man.

In a libel action the question whether the words complained of are capable of bearing a defamatory meaning is one for the judge. In deciding that question the judge must take into consideration not only the actual words complained of, but also their context and the person or persons to whom they were published, and the test to be applied is not whether some person might have understood the words as reflecting adversely on the plaintiff, but whether an ordinary, reasonable man would so construe them. If the words are to be held to be defamatory by reason of an inference to be drawn from them, it must be a natural and necessary inference.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., LOPES and RIGBY, L.JJ.) reversing a decision of POLLOCK, B.

The action was brought by the appellant, Lord William Nevill, against the respondents to recover damages for an alleged libel. It appeared from the statement of claim that the respondents, who carried on an insurance business in the city of London, had at one time engaged the appellant as their West End agent, and that, the agency having been terminated, they had written and published and sent to their customers a circular in which they stated that

The appellant alleged that this statement was untrue, the engagement having been terminated at his instance, and that the statement was calculated to injure him in his business as an insurance agent. The respondents, in their defence, admitted the publication, but denied that the words had the meaning attributed to them or were capable of bearing any defamatory meaning, and said that they published the words bona fide in the honest belief that they were true, and that they were published on a privileged occasion. The action was tried before POLLOCK, B., and a special jury, when the jury found that the circular was a libel upon the appellant, that the statement in the circular was not true, that the privilege, if any, was exceeded, and assessed the damages at £100. On further consideration, the learned judge gave judgment for the appellant for £100. The Court of Appeal set aside the judgment for the appellant and entered judgment for the respondents on the ground that there was no evidence of express malice to go to the jury so as to deprive the respondents of the privilege arising from the occasion.

Asquith, Q.C., and Poyser for the appellant.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., Eldon Bankes, and Marriott for the respondents were not called on to argue.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed, and I am somewhat embarrassed, to say the truth, by the multitude of reasons which appear to me to render success on the part of the appellant hopeless.

I am of opinion, in the first place, that there was no libel here at all, and I confess that, had I been the judge trying this cause, I should, at the end of the appellant’s case, have non-suited him without the smallest hesitation or doubt on the ground that there was no case to go to the jury. The question whether there is or is not a libellous publication is, in the first instance, for the judge. I am not insensible to the controversy which has existed ever since Fox’s Act [the Libel Act, 1792, passed “to remove doubts respecting the functions of juries in cases of libel”: 13 HALSBURY’S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 1120] was supposed to have settled it, with regard to the proper functions of judge and jury in that respect. Though Fox’s Act only applied to criminal cases, undoubtedly it has since the passing of that Act been assumed that the question of libel or no libel is for the jury and not for the judge, but subject always to this—that the matter which is charged as libellous shall be capable of being and apparently is libellous, calculated to bring the person into hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or to cause him some damage. I confess that I have listened with all the attention which it deserved to the argument which has been presented to us to-day, and I am unable now to know what is the sense in which any ordinary reasonable man would understand the words of this communication to be words exposing the appellant to hatred, or contempt, or ridicule. A

In saying that, of course it is necessary to take into consideration not only the actual words used, but also the context of the words, and the persons to whom the communications were made. I will read the whole letter :

“In forwarding the inclosed renewal notice I beg to inform you that the West End office of this company has been opened at 19, St. James’s Street, S.W., under Mr. Murray Faulkner. The agency of Lord William Nevill, at 27, Charles Street, St. James’s Square, has been closed by the directors. I shall, therefore, be obliged if you will kindly direct all communications to our West End secretary at 19, St. James’s Street, and I shall at all times be pleased to afford you any assistance in all matters relating to insurance against fire, burglary, accident, employers’ liability, and all risks.” B C

I think it is desirable that the whole letter should be read together. It is a business communication for a business purpose. The West End agency having been at one place, a business communication is made to a person who has an interest in knowing where communications are to be addressed, the new office is pointed out, and this passage occurs in the letter : D

I am wholly unable to understand how any ordinary reasonable man could have construed that one sentence in a business letter as being the smallest reflection on Lord William Nevill’s capacity as a business man, or upon his honour, or how it could in any respect expose him to hatred, contempt, or ridicule. I think this is far within Capital & Counties Bank v. Henty (1), because, as it appears to me, two propositions have been established on authority which it is difficult to question—first of all, that it is not enough to say that by some person or another the words might be understood in a defamatory sense. In the original argument of Henty’s Case (1) in the Court of Appeal I observe that BRETT, L.J., says this (5 C.P.D. at p. 541) : E F

“It seems to me unreasonable that, when there are a number of good interpretations, the only bad one should be seized upon to give a defamatory sense to the document. Therefore I am of opinion that this document could not reasonably be taken in a defamatory sense by those to whom it was published according to the primary meaning of the language used in it.” G

And in this House LORD WATSON affirmed the same proposition in language to which LORD SHAND has already called attention. It would not be enough, therefore, in this case to say that some persons might have understood these words as conveying some reflection upon the honour or business capacity of Lord William Nevill. That stands, therefore, as it appears to me, a long way distant from what was done in Henty’s Case (1), where a communication was made to the persons who had to make payments to the brewer in that case, and they were informed that the cheques of such and such a bank were not to be received in future. That undoubtedly, as LORD WATSON points out, might possibly, or would probably, by some persons have been understood to convey some reflections upon the solvency of the particular bank upon which the cheques were drawn. But he goes on to confirm what BRETT, L.J., says, which seems to me to be good sense—that because some persons may choose, not by reason of the language itself, but by reason of some fact to which it refers, to draw an unfavourable inference, it does not follow that therefore such matter is libellous. H I

Under those circumstances, as I have already said, if I had been the judge I should without hesitation have withdrawn the case from the jury, and if I had been sitting in a court of review under our old system of pleading, as little should I have hesitated to arrest judgment upon the ground that there was no libellous matter disclosed on the face of the declaration. As I have said, I am overwhelmed by the number of answers that can be made in this case. The sole ground on which the particular phrase in question is cavilled at is that the language of it when it is noted what the real facts are, suggests what is untrue. In the first place, I am of opinion that it was true; and if I think it was true, when I read the whole correspondence and see what the facts were, I hope it may be imputed to the gentleman who wrote it that he, at all events, might have been under the impression that it was true because he had only the same means of judging of its truth that I have, namely, the facts. The fact was that the agency was closed by its directors. It is true that the agency in one sense, and in a different sense from that in which I think the writer used the language, was continued during the period elapsing between the month of December and the month of March. There were negotiations going on during that time in which it was discussed between the company on the one side and the appellant on the other side, whether or not an agency of a different character should be carried on, but the one agency had been closed, and, as I understand the facts, and no attempt has been made to displace them, it was acquiesced in that that form of agency should be finally closed, and the negotiation which proceeded was as to the form in which a personal agency, so to speak, as distinguished from the agency which was established at the branch office at that place, should be continued. It is also true that during those negotiations in the period which elapsed between December and March Lord William Nevill was permitted to go on acting as agent for the company, and, as I understand the facts, acting as agent for the company in the new capacity, because, if that were not the fact, I do not understand upon what ground he could possibly have accepted £150 which was given to him, as he duly acknowledges in part of the correspondence.

Therefore, it appears to me that the very ground-work upon which the appellant's argument has been based fails him. I think that the statement was true, and, if the statement was true, that ground-work is displaced. But suppose it was not true, suppose it was not accurate in the sense in which people would have understood it, I am obliged to suppose a person of a very extraordinary mind who, looking at this document, misunderstood it. Suppose he did—suppose the persons who wrote that document intended to tell the truth and believed in the truth of what they were writing, even though in the mind of some other person it should be inaccurate in form, it seems to me that it would be impossible to contend that that would be evidence of malice, which under the circumstances it would be obviously necessary for the appellant to prove in order to recover—I say obviously because I do not think that anyone has contended that the occasion was not privileged. What has been contended is, that the occasion was abused and the privilege, therefore, did not exist. If what I have stated is true, there is no ground for saying that there was any attempt to do anything else than to make a business communication to persons who had the right to receive these communications, the secretary on the one side and the insurers on the other having a common interest in respect of which it was right that these communications should be made.

I am, therefore, of opinion, upon these grounds, that it is impossible to say that there is any evidence here which gives the smallest ground for a jury to find that this was malicious. I do not want to proceed to other grounds which might give rise to the suggestion that what I have been now saying is obiter, but one is met with the difficulty that there are so many grounds upon which one feels that this appeal cannot succeed that one is embarrassed in placing reliance particularly on one. But I have no hesitation in saying that there was no verdict here which would justify the entering of judgment for the appellant. The question whether or not this was a privileged communication as apart from the question whether it was a privileged occasion (I will now take the distinction which has been earnestly pressed upon your Lordships) has not been determined by the jury. That would, but for what I am about to say, give the appellant only a right to ask for a new trial, which, though he has not asked for it, it is no doubt within your Lordships' competence to give him, but what puts him out of court in that respect is that where you are complaining of non-direction of the judge, or that he did not leave a question to the jury, if you had an opportunity of asking him to do it and you abstained from asking for it, no court would ever have granted a new trial, for the obvious reason that, if you thought you had got enough, you were not allowed to stand aside and let all the expense be incurred and a new trial ordered simply because of your own neglect. I am not imputing neglect or want of astuteness to those who conducted the appellant's case; on the contrary, I think that they were very alert and astute in what they did—because obviously, if that question had been put to the jury the jury would have negatived malice, and, therefore, they thought they had got enough in the words which the jury were supposed to have used. But it is manifest that that might be insufficient, because there might be an excess in the words used, and yet they might not be enough to justify a finding of malice or excess of privilege as distinguished from an excess of words. No one could rely upon the verdict which the jury actually did find as showing that they found such malice on the part of the person who wrote the letter, or on whose behalf it was written, as would justify a judgment for the plaintiff.

On these grounds it appears to me impossible to maintain that the appellant here could succeed. For myself I may perhaps regret that the Court of Appeal did not take the view which I think RIGBY, L.J., did, because I think it is important that parties should know that there is still one question for the court apart from the question of malice, viz., whether the words are susceptible in point of law of being a libellous communication. If it were otherwise, the jurisdiction over and over again exercised by the courts in arresting judgment, even after a verdict in respect of libels, could not have existed. If it is said, because it is suggested that it may be libellous it must go to the jury, I entirely differ from that view—the words must be susceptible of a libellous meaning in this sense, that a reasonable man could construe them unfavourably in such a sense as to make some imputation upon the person complaining. For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. I also am unable to see anything libellous in the circular of Mar. 15, when it is fairly read, having regard to the purpose for which it was written. I should also be very sorry to say that there was any statement in that letter which was untrue. I do not think the statement was complete, but, if it had been complete, I do not think it would have made any difference. It would have been complete if it had stated that the directors in December had resolved to close this agency, that negotiations had since been continued which were unsatisfactory, and that Lord William Nevill had written to say that he desired to sever his connection with the company. From a statement of that sort, if it had been reasonable to expect so full a statement in the letter, I think exactly the same inference might have been drawn. When people in business desire to sever their connection it is very easy to suggest that the fault lies on the one side or the other, but I do not think that any reasonable person reading this letter fairly would come to the conclusion that the directors had closed the agency for any reason discreditable to Lord William Nevill. I also think, agreeing with the Court of Appeal to this extent, that there was no evidence of malice. The jury were asked whether the letter was malicious, and they declined to say that it was, or, at any rate, they could not agree in saying that it was. For the reasons the Lord Chancellor has given I do not think the appellant is entitled to say that there ought to be a new trial, and on these grounds, agreeing with the reasons which have been already given, I am of opinion that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

LORD SHAND.—I also am of opinion that the appeal should be disallowed for the reasons which have been already so fully stated. It appears to me that the

A document which is founded on as libellous, read in the light of the few surrounding facts which were before the jury, was not of such a character that the judge presiding at the trial should have left it to the jury to say whether it was a libel or not. In the statement of claim, and in the argument which has been submitted by the appellant's counsel, a few words have been taken from the letter of the respondents' secretary of Mar. 15, 1894, as warranting the contention that the latter was libellous—viz., the words,

But we must take the document as a whole; and if we take it with the opening message, it appears to me that these words are not calculated to convey or to suggest any imputation against the plaintiff. In the first paragraph there is a notice given to those transacting business with the company that the West End office of the company has been opened at 19, St. James's Street—that is to say, that the company, which had no such office previously, has now got an office of its own in that district under Mr. Murray Faulkner. What follows—viz., that the agency of Lord William Nevill has been closed by the directors—is a statement of the natural sequence of the establishment of this new office. Certainly you cannot extract from those words the meaning, directly, that there is any imputation made against Lord William Nevill. It is said that an imputation may be inferred, but that inference certainly is not a necessary inference; and, as it appears to me, it is neither a natural nor a reasonable inference to draw from the words in the circumstances in which we find them.

The case, therefore, appears to me to be one in which Henty's Case (1), decided in this House, is absolutely decisive. In that case the language used in reference to the Capital and Counties Bank, whose cheques, it was said, were to be no longer received, was of a character much more suggestive of an imputation against the soundness of the bank than anything can be represented to be here in the language used as applicable to Lord William Nevill. In the statement of claim there was no averment of extrinsic facts known to those receiving the circular, which would show that the language was fitted to convey to them any secondary meaning injurious to the appellant, and no evidence of such facts, no evidence of circumstances calculated to give the words used a more extended sense than their natural meaning, was presented at the trial. I am of opinion, therefore, that the letter complained of was not a libel, and should not have been allowed to go to the jury as such for the reasons which have been given by your Lordships.

I am further of opinion that the statements in the letter were true, and were certainly made by the secretary in the belief that they were true. The writer obviously had in his mind, not the correspondence which had taken place immediately before with reference to the new arrangement as to the commissions to be allowed to the appellant on business brought by him after the company should have opened their own West End office, but what had occurred with reference to the permanent and important position of agent which the appellant had held at “the agency at 27, Charles Street,” when he was really transacting the West End agency business. In that view the writer of the letter was correct in saying that the agency had been closed by the directors, for it was they who had terminated the permanent agency, though there had been a temporary and more limited or different agency or arrangement for payment of commissions for a later period.

I must say that I am further very clearly of opinion that, the occasion on which the letter complained of was issued having been admittedly privileged (for there is no question raised as to this), no evidence was presented to the jury that would establish a case of malice. The jury themselves have not given a verdict of malice, which would be necessary to displace the privilege. It is true that something else was put to the jury by the judge, viz., the question whether the jury thought that the defendants “exceeded the occasion of privilege.” The words

"exceeded the occasion," ambiguous as these words seem to me, having been used, A the jury no doubt found that the "privilege had been exceeded," or, to put it otherwise, that there had been what they called "sharp practice." I do not think a finding of that kind is enough to entitle the plaintiff to a verdict for damages for libel. The jury shrank from saying there was malice—they declined to say there was malice—they were then asked the question whether there was something short B of malice on the part of the respondents, and they said there was. They were not asked whether that excess of privilege was such as to amount to malice. The learned judge was not asked to put this question by the appellant's counsel I suppose for the obvious reason that the jury had already indicated that they would not answer it in the affirmative. As they were not asked that, it appears to me not only that the verdict which the appellant did get did not entitle him to have judgment entered C for the damages which were given, but that, in my view on this part of the case, a new trial could not have been granted.

Under these circumstances, and assuming that evidence of malice in the acts or communications of the officials of an incorporation in the conduct of their business would be an answer to a plea of privilege, and concurring with what has been already said by your Lordships, I am of opinion that the appeal should be disallowed. D

LORD DAVEY.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the words complained of were not fairly susceptible of any meaning that would have justified the jury in finding them to be libellous. I also think that the words in question were true in fact in the only sense relevant to the context in which they are found, and I agree with the learned judges in the Court of Appeal that there was no evidence of malice E to be submitted to the jury.

BATES v. DONALDSON G

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant not to assign without consent—Refusal of consent—Ground for refusal—Landlord desiring to obtain possession and willing to pay to tenant same amount as proposed assignee.

A lease contained a covenant by the tenant not to assign without a licence. I which was "not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible person." The tenant applied for a licence to assign to the defendant, who was a respectable and responsible person, but the plaintiff, the then landlord, refused his consent, his reason being that he desired to obtain possession of the premises himself, that he was prepared to pay for a surrender the same amount as the defendant was for an assignment, and that, as the tenant and the defendant were strangers to each other, there was no particular reason why the tenant should prefer the defendant to himself. The plaintiff, however, never in fact made an offer to pay this price for a surrender. The tenant thereupon assigned the lease to the defendant without the plaintiff's licence. In an action for forfeiture of the lease for breach of the covenant,

Held: in the circumstances the plaintiff had unreasonably refused his licence to the assignment, and the action, therefore, failed.

Per KAY, L.J.: If the plaintiff had in fact offered to buy at the price the tenant asked, the case might have been different.

Notes. By s. 19 (1) (a) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (13 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 904) in all leases containing a covenant, condition or agreement against assigning, underletting, charging or parting with possession of demised premises or any part thereof without licence or consent, such covenant, condition or agreement shall be subject to a provision to the effect that such licence or consent is not to be unreasonably withheld.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of MATHEW, J., holding that no forfeiture of a lease had been incurred on account of its being assigned to the defendant without the plaintiff's licence.

The action was brought to recover possession of a house, No. 14, Cavendish Square. On Oct. 15, 1888, a lease of this house was granted by Mr. Stanford to Mrs. Wilson for fourteen years from Sept. 29, 1888. The lease contained a covenant by Mrs. Wilson

"that she the said lessee, her executors, administrators, or assigns, shall not nor will assign or underlet the premises hereby demised or intended so to be or any part thereof for the whole or any part of the term hereby granted without having first obtained a written permission or licence signed by the said lessor, such permission or licence not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of any respectable and responsible person who may be the proposed assignee or under-tenant."

There was a proviso for re-entry upon breach of covenant.

On July 30, 1889, the reversion expectant upon the lease was conveyed to the plaintiff. In 1895 Mrs. Wilson desired to sell the residue of the term. The plaintiff was anxious to obtain possession of the house. He had bought the reversion with the intention of providing a residence for his wife and grandchildren after his death. An agent for the plaintiff saw Mrs. Wilson, and ascertained that she would sell her interest for £400, but he was not then authorised to agree to buy. Five days afterwards Mrs. Wilson, not having received any further communication from the plaintiff or his agent, agreed to sell her lease to the defendant for £400. Later in the same day the plaintiff's agent saw Mrs. Wilson, and said he was authorised to offer £400 on behalf of the plaintiff. She informed him that she had already sold to the defendant. On Feb. 11 Mrs. Wilson applied to the plaintiff for his licence to assign, and on Feb. 28 the plaintiff refused to give his permission. The defendant was a stranger to Mrs. Wilson and there was no reason why she should prefer to sell to him rather than to the plaintiff. The defendant was a respectable and responsible person, and he did not intend to use the house in any manner to which objection could be made. The only reason which the plaintiff had for refusing his licence to assign, was that he desired to get possession of the house for himself. When the plaintiff refused to give his permission to assign, he did not offer to buy the plaintiff's interest for £400 or any sum. He did not allege in his pleading that he had done so, nor offer to do so. He was, in fact, always willing to buy for £400.

The defendant obtained a decree for specific performance of her contract against Mrs. Wilson, and she assigned her lease to him, and he took possession of the house. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action to recover possession of the house, upon the ground that a forfeiture had been incurred by the assignment without his licence. MATHEW, J., held that the licence had been unreasonably withheld, and gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

June 20, 1896. The following judgments were read.

KAY, L.J.—This is an action of ejectment by a landlord to recover possession of No. 14, Cavendish Square, for breach of covenant by the tenant. The covenant in question, contained in a lease for fourteen years from Sept. 29, 1888, was not to assign “without having first obtained a written permission or licence signed by the said lessor, such permission or licence not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of any respectable and responsible person who may be the proposed assignee.”

It is plain on the face of that covenant that it is not sufficient that the proposed assignee should be a respectable and responsible person. The words clearly show that the landlord may nevertheless have some reasonable ground for refusing his consent. I shall not attempt to give any exhaustive definition of what would be in every conceivable case an unreasonable withholding of permission. The only question which it is necessary to consider is whether in the circumstances of this case the refusal was reasonable within the meaning of this covenant. Counsel admitted, and I agree, that if the proposed assignee intended to use the house for some purpose to which the landlord might reasonably object, though such purpose was not forbidden by the lease nor by any rule of law, the landlord might reasonably refuse to permit the assignment. So I should think there might be other reasons, personal rather to the landlord than the tenant, which might justify his refusal under the terms of this covenant. In this case the plaintiff bought the interest of the original lessor with the intention, he says, of leaving the house to his wife if she survived him, for herself and his grandchildren to live in after his death. With this object he negotiated with the lessee, Mrs. Wilson, to purchase her interest, and his agent obtained Mrs. Wilson's consent to sell her interest for £400. Not having received any further communication from the plaintiff, five days later Mrs. Wilson agreed to sell her lease to the defendant Donaldson. She did not communicate her intention to do this to the plaintiff, and of course she did not obtain his consent. She did not ask for it. She has no reason for preferring Donaldson to the plaintiff. All that she wants is to get rid of the lease and to get £400 for her interest. The plaintiff says that he has always been willing to give her £400, and he admits that he wishes to compel her to sell it to him, and that this is the reason why, when an application was made for his written consent after the contract to sell to Donaldson, he refused to give it.

It is obvious that, if the plaintiff had a right to refuse his consent, that right cannot be taken away or affected by anything done by the lessee before she asked for it. Donaldson has obtained a decree for specific performance against her. That cannot alter the rights of the plaintiff in any way. The sole question is: Was the plaintiff unreasonable in refusing his consent at the time when he was asked to give it? As the proposed assignee in this case is a respectable and responsible person the plaintiff must show a strong reason for withholding his consent. Clearly it is not sufficient for him to say: "I want to oblige the lessee to sell to me." He must at least be able to show that, at the time when the consent was refused, if that was his motive, the refusal did no harm to the lessee. I cannot find that before or at the time when the plaintiff refused his consent he had offered to buy the lessee's interest for £400 or any sum. He does not allege in his pleading that he did so. He does not offer to do so in his pleading. The plaintiff is, therefore, in the position of asserting simply that he is entitled to eject the defendant because he has not got his written permission. That is not the contract. The lessee had a right to assign without his permission if he withheld it unreasonably. Was it reasonable to refuse without making any offer to buy for himself? If he had answered the request for permission by saying: "I was in treaty with you to buy, and was ready to give the price you asked, and I now offer it to you," the case might have been different, but that at least he ought to have done. He did nothing of the kind. On the contrary, his excuse for refusing permission was that he believed the purchaser intended to carry on at the house his business of a picture dealer, and it was only when this failed that the plaintiff set up the plea on which he now relies. On the whole I am of opinion that the refusal was under the circumstances unreasonable, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an action of ejectment brought by Sir Edward Bates against Mr. Donaldson, and the question is: What is the meaning of the phrase that "permission to assign shall not be unreasonably withheld" in a clause in a lease?

In the year 1889 Sir Edward Bates purchased of Mr. Stanford the reversion of 14, Cavendish Square, expectant upon the determination of a lease theretofore granted to Mrs. Wilson, which expires in 1902. In the year 1895 Sir Edward became desirous of obtaining possession of these premises, and through an agent negotiated with Mrs. Wilson for the surrender by her to him of her lease. Mrs. Wilson asked £400 for her unexpired term. The agent was not authorised by Sir Edward Bates to accept this offer, and some days elapsed before he obtained authority from Sir Edward to agree to pay this amount to Mrs. Wilson. In the meantime she, having no contract with Sir Edward that he would give what she asked, on Feb. 7, 1895, entered into a contract with Mr. Donaldson to assign to him the residue of her term for £400. Sir Edward, as it turns out, would have given Mrs. Wilson the £400 which she asked, but when she contracted with Mr. Donaldson she did not know this. It is now admitted that Mr. Donaldson is in every way a respectable and responsible person, and that no objection can be made to him personally, nor is it suggested that he is about to use 14, Cavendish Square in any improper or undesirable manner.

On Feb. 11, 1895, application was made to Sir Edward Bates for his licence to assign to Mr. Donaldson, and Sir Edward took exception to Mr. Donaldson as an assignee, and ultimately on Feb. 28, 1895, declined to give his assent. It must now, however, be taken that the sole reason he had for refusing his assent was because he wanted possession of the house himself, and he now seeks to eject Mr. Donaldson, who has entered into possession of the house, upon the ground that the following covenant in the lease to Mrs. Wilson has not been complied with by her. There is in the lease a power to re-enter in case of breach of any of the covenants therein. It will be seen that it is only when a respectable and responsible person is proposed as assignee or under-tenant that this clause—as to the permission not being unreasonably withheld—comes into play. If the person proposed be not a respectable and responsible person, the lessor has an absolute right to refuse permission; if, however, the person proposed be respectable and responsible, then the lessor cannot unreasonably withhold his permission. This stipulation as to the permission not being unreasonably withheld (if a respectable and responsible person is obtained) releases the lessee from the covenant not to assign without permission, if the permission is unreasonably withheld, and this was so held in Treloar v. Bigge (1).

What is an unreasonable withholding of permission within the meaning of this clause? It is conceded by counsel, who appeared for Sir Edward Bates, that, if a tenant was desirous of assigning to a friend, it would be unreasonable for the lessor to withhold his assent for the purpose of breaking the lease; but, it was said, if it was not to a friend, but to a stranger, and the lessor was willing to pay what the lessee wanted and as much as he could get from a stranger, it was not unreasonable to withhold his assent in order, if possible, to break the lease, if he wanted the premises for himself. This is not my reading of the clause. It is admitted that there is no case in the books which covers the present. When the lessor granted the lease he parted with his interest in the premises for the entire term. The tenant during that term can assign to any respectable and responsible assignee, in which case the lessor is bound not to unreasonably withhold his permission. It is not, in my opinion, the true reading of this clause that the permission can be withheld in order to enable the lessor to regain possession of the premises before the termination of the term. This clause was inserted, in my judgment, alio intuitu altogether, and in order to protect the lessor from having his premises used or occupied in an undesirable way or by an undesirable tenant or assignee, and not in order to enable the lessor, if possible, to coerce a tenant to surrender the term, so that the lessor might obtain possession of the premises, which was the reason why in the present case the assent was withheld. For these reasons I think that MATHEW, J., came to a right conclusion, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

The question whether a part of a machine is dangerous within the meaning of the Factory and Workshops Act, 1878, s. 5 [now the Factories Act, 1961, s. 14] is one of fact in each case and will depend on whether there is a substantial probability that accidents will result from the use of the machinery. A part of a machine will be dangerous if in the ordinary course of human affairs danger may reasonably be anticipated from it when it is worked without protection. In determining whether machinery is dangerous consideration must be given to the contingency of carelessness on the part of the workman in charge of it, the frequency with which that contingency is likely to occur, and all other matters likely to make the machine dangerous.

Notes. The Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 and 1891, have been repealed. Section 5 of the 1878 Act, as amended, has been substantially re-enacted by the Factories Act, 1961, s. 14. The latter section applies to "every dangerous part of any machinery, other than prime movers and transmission machinery" (to which special provisions apply).

Appeal by Case Stated from a decision of the Recorder of Blackburn, reversing a decision of the justices of Blackburn.

On Oct. 3, 1895, Ephraim Hindle and George Hindle appeared before the justices of Blackburn on an information under the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 and 1891, laid by Birtwistle, one of Her Majesty's inspectors of factories, charging

“that they on Aug. 7, 1895, at the said borough, being then and there the occupiers of a certain cotton factory, the same being a factory within the true intent and meaning of the said Acts did unlawfully fail to keep such factory in conformity with the said Acts by then and there neglecting to fence a certain dangerous part of the machinery in such factory, to wit shuttles, such shuttles not being in such a position or of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed in the said factory as they would be if they were securely fenced.”

The justices convicted the defendants, and fined them 20s. The defendants appealed to quarter sessions where the recorder quashed the conviction subject to a Case Stated.

The Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, s. 5, provided :

“With respect to the fencing of machinery in a factory the following provisions shall have effect. . . . (3) Every part of the mill gearing shall either be securely fenced, or be in such position or of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed in the factory as it would be if it were securely fenced.”

By the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, s. 6 :

“(2). In sub-s. (3) of the same section [i.e., s. 5 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878], before the words ‘every part’ shall be inserted the words ‘all dangerous parts of the machinery and. . . .’ ”

The appellants, Ephraim Hindle and George Hindle, were on Aug. 7, 1895, and had been for several years previously, the occupiers of a certain weaving shed in Blackburn, in which there were the ordinary looms and shuttles used in weaving cotton cloth. It was admitted that the shed was a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 and 1891. On Aug. 7, 1895, a shuttle flew out of the shuttle race of one of the looms in work in the said factory, and in its flight struck and seriously injured a weaver in the employment of the appellants. The accident was caused by the negligence of the said weaver in fastening the picking band of the loom too taut, whereby the shuttle was deflected from its proper course in the shuttle race, and so flew out. In addition to this accident there were during the years 1891 to 1895, both inclusive, three other serious accidents caused by shuttles flying from looms in the appellants’ factory, but to what cause or causes the said accidents were to be attributed there was no evidence to show. During that period and down to Aug. 7, 1895, there were 1,400 looms or thereabouts in work during most working days in the factory; and it was agreed, so far as the looms and shuttles were concerned, that the appellants’ machinery was substantially in the same condition all through the said period up to and including Aug. 7, 1895.

It was proved that while the shuttle is working in due course it is not dangerous, but occasionally shuttles do fly out from the shuttle race during the process of weaving under circumstances which do render such flying shuttles dangerous to any person who may chance to be in the line of their flight, and the evidence went to show that the flying out of the shuttles from the shuttle race is due to one or other of the following causes : (i) in consequence of the shuttle not being true; (ii) in consequence of the negligence of the weaver in fastening the picking band too taut, or some other act of negligent user of the machinery by the person in charge of it; (iii) in consequence of some foreign substance accidentally getting into the shuttle race; (iv) in consequence of some defect in the yarn or thread used in the loom. It was not suggested that the appellants’ looms or any of them were at any time during the period before mentioned, or on Aug. 7, 1895, fitted with shuttles that were not true, nor was there any evidence that the appellants omitted any reasonable precaution to prevent foreign substances getting in the yarn or thread, or that there was in fact any foreign substance in the shuttle race of any of the appellants' looms, or any defect in any of the yarn or thread used in their looms, during the same period or on Aug. 7.

The questions for the court as stated by the learned recorder were as follows: If the court was of opinion that the fact that the appellants' looms and shuttles were on Aug. 7 liable to become temporarily dangerous (a) either by some negligent act of the person in charge of the said looms, or (b) by some foreign substance getting into the shuttle race, or (c) by some defect in the yarn or thread used in the process of weaving, rendering the said looms or shuttles dangerous machinery, or dangerous parts of machinery, or dangerous parts of any machinery within the meaning of the Factory Acts, 1878 and 1891, the learned recorder's decision was to be reversed. If the court was of a contrary opinion, it was to stand.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Webster, Q.C.) (H. Sutton and L. Sanderson with him) for the respondent.

WILLS, J.—This case is no doubt one of considerable importance. Still I can see no benefit in reserving judgment since the enactment seems to be plain and intelligible, and I feel no difficulty in construing it, nor would I in applying it if the facts of the case were fully before me.

The learned recorder gives the reason of his decision in one sentence in which he says that

“the manufacturer is only responsible for machinery which is in itself dangerous in the ordinary course of careful working.”

He appears to think that no machinery can be dangerous within the Act unless it is dangerous in itself however carefully worked. I altogether disagree with such an interpretation, which would limit materially and disastrously the operation of a most beneficial Act of Parliament. It seems to me that machinery is dangerous, if in the ordinary course of human affairs danger may reasonably be anticipated from it when it is worked without protection. To say that because accidents have happened through its use therefore it must be dangerous, is wrong. To say that because no accidents would happen if it were worked with absolute care therefore it cannot be dangerous, is also wrong. In considering whether machinery is dangerous, the contingency of carelessness on the part of workmen in charge of it, the frequency with which such contingency is likely to occur, and all other matters likely to make the machine become dangerous, are to be taken into consideration. If, taking what is reasonably certain to happen, the court thinks there is a substantial probability that accidents will result from the machinery, the machinery is dangerous within the Act, and the court should convict. That whole thing is a question of degree. The court must in each case decide on the facts as proved before it. As the learned recorder does not seem to have applied his mind to this point, I think the Case must go back to him for reconsideration.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion. The justices, who are presumably persons acquainted with these matters, came to the conclusion that these shuttles were dangerous. The recorder reversed their decision on a view of the law which I think is erroneous. The chance of foreign matter getting into the machinery, the chance of defects in the yarn or negligence in the workers, are all to be taken into consideration, but none of them is in itself conclusive. The mere fact that any of these may cause the shuttle to fly out, and that when it flies out it is dangerous, is not conclusive either. The court must consider whether the tendency it has to fly out is a tendency to fly out often enough to satisfy a reasonable interpretation of the word “dangerous.” The whole question is one of degree and of fact in all cases.

By s. 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855 [repealed]: "The word 'drain' . . . shall also include any drain for draining any group or block of houses by a combined operation under the order of any vestry or district board, and the word 'sewer' shall mean and include sewers and drains of every description except drains to which the word 'drain' interpreted as afore-said applies."

In 1866 the owner of a row of houses in London drained them by laying down a line of pipes which were connected with a sewer belonging to the vestry in an adjoining street. There was no evidence that this was done by the order or with the sanction of the vestry or of the Metropolitan Board of Works as required by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855.

Held: the probable inference of fact was that the laying down of the pipes was done with the sanction and authority of the vestry and of the Metropolitan Board of Works as there were ample powers of interference to prevent its being done unlawfully, but, even if this were not so, the pipes constituted a "sewer" within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, s. 250, and the vestry was liable for their repair.

Notes. The Metropolis Management Acts, 1855 and 1862 have been repealed. Statutory provisions relating to sewage and drainage in London are now to be found in the Public Health (London) Act, 1936, ss. 14-81 (15 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 896 et seq.). For s. 250 of the 1855 Act, see now s. 81 of the 1936 Act.

The vestries and district boards constituted by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, were the predecessors of the borough councils. Their powers were transferred to the metropolitan borough councils by the London Government Act, 1899 (15 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 644). The Metropolitan Board of Works was the predecessor of the London County Council.

Court (LORD RUSSELL, C.J., and WRIGHT, J.), reported [1896] 2 Q.B. 95, making absolute a rule nisi for a mandamus.

In July, 1894, the School Board for London acquired certain lands in Tyrell Street, in the parish of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green. At that time there was a row of houses on the land, which were drained by pipes which had been laid down by the former owner in 1866, along the back of the houses, and carried the sewage into a sewer under a neighbouring street called Turin Street. The School Board pulled down the existing houses and erected other buildings, and proposed to connect them with the existing pipes in Tyrell Street; but these pipes turned out on examination to be in a defective state, and the School Board called upon the vestry to repair them. This the vestry declined to do on the ground that they were not a sewer vested in them which they were liable to repair. There was no evidence that the pipes in Tyrell Street had been laid down by the order, or with the sanction, of the vestry, or of the Metropolitan Board of Works within s. 74 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, or s. 47 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862. It was admitted that the sewer under Turin Street was vested in the vestry. The School Board obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus to the vestry to repair the drain, which was made absolute as above mentioned.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I cannot forbear from saying that I think that the circumstances under which this case comes before your Lordships are a little unsatisfactory in this respect, that we have not all the facts that we might have had, and all the light which might have been thrown on the position of affairs by a more accurate description of the premises in respect to which this matter arises. But now that the matter has been explained and the affidavits carefully looked to, the question of fact appears to be clear that, apart from the definitions which are contained in the Acts referred to, this is undoubtedly what everybody would understand by and call a sewer.

Assuming that there is a distinction between a sewer and a drain apart from that which the Act of Parliament has made, I have always understood that a drain was a private thing, but that a sewer was a public thing to serve the purposes of the public; and the word “drain” appears to have been selected under the statute in order to mark that distinction. As a matter of fact, this is some contrivance, ditch, drain, call it what you will (I mean apart from the technical meaning of the word “drain” in the statute), which is an artificial construction, and carries the sewage of a very large number of houses into a pre-existing sewer in Turin Street; and, first of all as to the question of fact, I cannot entertain the smallest doubt that when that was made, by whomsoever it was made, everybody in the neighbourhood, certainly the surveyor of highways, the proper officer of the vestry, must have perfectly well known what was being done. It is not a small operation: it is an operation which must have been done certainly with public notice to everybody; they must have taken up some part of the public highway, and there must have been considerable work done for the purpose of connecting that drain with what is admitted on all hands to be an old sewer in Turin Street. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that the inference I should draw is that it must have been known to the local authority.

We come back now to the Act of Parliament. If this is a sewer, apart from what has been described as the artificial system, a combined drain, it is impossible to avoid the application of the language of the Act of Parliament that it is vested in the vestry and is to be repaired by them. There are two things, and only two things so far as I see, which can prevent its being vested in the vestry, and which, if they were established, would—I think not in favour of the private proprietor, but rather against his will—subject to certain restrictions, make things which may to some extent serve a public purpose be nevertheless repairable by him and at his expense. One, of course, is, naturally and justly, that where it only applies to the drainage of a single house the proprietor must connect his private property with the public sewer, and must make and maintain that drain which runs into the public sewer. A

Then comes an additional provision that if a particular block of houses, a certain number of houses, may be more conveniently and economically drained by one combined system or operation, then, not in aid of the proprietor, but rather imposing an additional burden on him, though it is in one sense a sewer draining more than one house, nevertheless, if an order is made by the vestry that there shall be a combined operation for drainage, then, notwithstanding that that does to some extent fulfil what I would call a public function, it is to remain a drain, and, therefore, to be repaired by the private proprietor. It is not denied here that there is no evidence of any such order making that combined operation into a drain and not a sewer; and inasmuch as undoubtedly the fact that it drains more than one house gets rid of the ordinary meaning of the word "drain," indeed of any meaning of the word "drain" even by this Act of Parliament except by that operation, it is manifest that those who insist upon its being a drain and not a sewer must establish as matter of proof that the order of the vestry has been made; and I know of nothing which can avoid the exigency of the Act of Parliament in impressing upon the property that particular quality unless an order of the vestry be properly made. It cannot be denied that there is no such order; and I, for one, decline to draw the inference of fact that any such order was made, because I do not believe that it was made; and no tribunal, I think, ought to draw an inference contrary to what they believe to be the fact. B C D E

But it is said the vestry themselves would have no authority to do this thing and make this drain without the sanction of the Metropolitan Board of Works. As to that, it depends to my mind, upon totally different considerations, because in that case the vestry, if they did it, would be in one way fulfilling the duty cast upon them by the Act of Parliament. From the description of these houses given by some of the witnesses in the affidavits, they were certainly calculated to be very deleterious to the health of the inhabitants generally. There were cesspools immediately behind the houses, the liquid slops were thrown into the street, and no one could doubt that, invested as the vestry were with the powers of insisting upon what was necessary for the health and comfort of the inhabitants, it was their duty in some way or other to provide for the drainage of these different houses. What we know as a fact is that the drainage was altered from the system which had been previously pursued, and that between thirty and forty years ago the cesspools were filled up and this long line of conduit constructed which goes into the sewer in Turin Street. I should myself draw the inference that that was done either by the vestry itself or by some other person, very likely by agreement between the vestry and the proprietor, each of them being desirous, the one to make the houses convenient and habitable, and the other, the vestry, in fulfilment of their duty to provide for the health and sanitation of the inhabitants of their district. By whomsoever it was done, it was done, and as a sewer. F G H

It is said that the vestry themselves would not have power to do it without the authority of the Metropolitan Board of Works. I will assume for this purpose that as the regular and proper course of procedure they ought to have received the sanction of the Metropolitan Board of Works; but, if they did not do so, I think, that although they were not fulfilling their strict administrative duty, it could not be said that it was unlawful. They were providing for a duty which they had to discharge, and they ought to give notice, to get the sanction in that sense, of the Metropolitan Board of Works; and I should be disposed, if it were necessary, to presume that they did, though perhaps not in the regular way, get the sanction and authority; but the fact remains that something or another was done at a distance of time between thirty and forty years from the present time, which, if it were done I by the vestry and by the authority of the Metropolitan Board of Works, was lawfully and properly done; and, inasmuch as there are ample powers of interference to prevent its being done if it was unlawful in the sense in which I have described the word unlawful, and no such interference was ever suggested, though from the nature of the thing done it was necessarily a thing which must have been known and publicly known to the authorities, I should come to the conclusion that it was done with the sanction and authority both of the vestry and of the Metropolitan Board of Works.

It seems to me, therefore, that one has exhausted the whole ground; it must be either a sewer or a private drain. I have pointed out what appears to me to be a fatal blot in the effort to make it a private drain. Therefore the only other alternative is that it must be a sewer; and if it is a sewer it is to be repaired by the proper local authority. I think, therefore, that a mandamus ought to issue, and that this judgment ought to be affirmed, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion. The sewer as to which this question arises clearly comes within the definition of sewer in the Act of 1855, unless it be shown that it is taken out of that definition by being within the definition of "drain." That can only be shown if it be shown that it was constructed by reason of an order of the vestry under the provisions of s. 74. If all construction of a sewer had been illegal unless by virtue of such an order, how far in that case, in view of the time that has elapsed, it would have been right to presume an order it is not necessary to inquire. But it is perfectly manifest that such an order is not the only way in which this sewer could be legally made. I think that there is strong evidence that no such order was made, because an order is a thing of which a record would almost certainly be kept. Therefore I think it is not shown, and there is no ground for presuming, that this combination was made by any order of the vestry. If that be so, it is a sewer within the meaning of the Act.

Then s. 68 provides that all sewers thereafter to be made shall be vested in the vestry. It is not disputed that if vested in the vestry this is to be repaired by the vestry. Therefore, the only question is, whether it is so vested in the vestry. The words are absolutely wide and unlimited, "all sewers" thereafter to be made, and it is only sought to cut down those words by suggesting that it must mean all sewers lawfully made. First of all it is said that this sewer could not be lawfully made without the sanction of the vestry to its connection with their drainage system, and, further, without the approval of the Metropolitan Board of Works.

The only evidence upon the subject of whether there was sanction and approval is an affidavit by a gentleman who has been vestry surveyor since 1884 in which he says that he can find no record either of sanction or of an application to the Metropolitan Board of Works in the vestry records. I do not think that sufficient to justify a conclusion that this drainage arrangement connecting with the Turin Street sewer was constructed without any such sanction or approval as the statute refers to. I think that when you have such a sewer as this draining this street existing for thirty years and more, and especially in view of the fact that there is power in the vestry for the health of the neighbourhood to compel owners of houses within 100 feet of a sewer to drain into that sewer, and that therefore there was power in the vestry to insist upon the owners of these houses in Tyrell Street, or at all events such as were within 100 feet of Turin Street, draining into the Turin Street sewer each by a separate drain (which under the circumstances would manifestly be inconvenient), there is every reason for supposing that the vestry would sanction a combined system of drainage which should drain not only the houses in Tyrell Street, which they could have compelled them to drain into the Turin Street sewer, but also the general row of houses which it might well have been thought it was for the advantage of the neighbourhood should be drained, and of which there was perhaps no means of compelling the drainage in so far as they were beyond 100 feet from the Turin Street sewer so far as we know. Therefore, I think there is in this case good ground for presuming that the connection of this sewer for draining the houses in Tyrell Street with the sewer in Turin Street received the sanction of the vestry, and, in the absence of any distinct proof to the contrary, received the sanction of the Metropolitan Board of Works. But, even if that could not be made out, I do not think that it would follow, if the sanction of the vestry was given, that the sewer could be held not to be a sewer within the meaning of s. 68 merely because the vestry had failed to perform their statutory duty of first submitting the plans to the Metropolitan Board of Works and obtaining their sanction. A B

It is quite true that the statute of 1855 says that no new sewer is to be made—I think there it means made by the vestry—without the sanction of the Metropolitan Board of Works. The Act of 1862 carries it further, and provides that no person other than the vestry shall make a new sewer without the sanction of the vestry, and the vestry shall not sanction the construction of such sewer till the Metropolitan Board of Works have approved. But it does not follow that because the requisite sanctions have not been obtained the thing constructed is not a sewer. The statute does not say “all sewers thereafter constructed with the sanctions and approvals required by this Act.” If it did, of course the matter would have been clear that, unless such sanction or approval had been given, or was to be presumed to have been given, the construction could not be deemed a sewer within the meaning of the Act. But the legislature has not said that, and of course there are many instances in which certain consents are requisite, and the failure to procure those assents may be a wrongful Act on the part of those who ought to have obtained them, where, nevertheless, the thing when done is none the less done, and regarded as a matter which cannot be treated as absolutely void and a nullity because the requisite consents have not been obtained. So here, I think, when one looks at the very words of the Act of 1862 itself it speaks of the thing, as to which the consents are to be obtained, as a sewer; and in the language of this legislation I think it is none the less a sewer within the meaning of the Act even though that sewer may have come into existence without certain assents and approvals which, as between public bodies, the statute requires. For these reasons I think that the judgment appealed from ought to be affirmed. C D E F

Insurance—Marine insurance—Collision clause—Clause in no case to extend to any sum which assured might become liable to pay for removal of obstructions under statutory powers—Liability of underwriters under clause.

The appellants insured their ship by a policy of insurance which contained a collision clause to which a proviso was appended: "Provided always that this clause shall in no case extend to any sum which the assured may become liable to pay, or shall pay, for removal of obstructions under statutory powers consequent on such collision." The appellants' ship came into collision with another ship which sank, became a total loss, and was removed by river commissioners under the statutory powers. Both vessels were to blame for the collision, and by agreement the appellants paid to the owners of the sunken vessel a moiety of the sum which they had paid for the removal of their ship. The appellants claimed this sum from the underwriters.

Held: the proviso must be construed as a document between business men, and so read any payment for the removal of obstructions was excluded; accordingly, the underwriters were not liable.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., A. L. SMITH and RIGBY, L.JJ.), affirming a decision of BRUCE, J., in favour of the respondent.

The following was the agreed statement of facts: On June 14, 1895, the appellants, as owners of the steamship Engineer, effected with the respondent (inter alios) a policy of insurance subscribed by the respondent in the sum of £100 on the hull and machinery of the steamship Engineer, valued at £8,500, for twelve months from noon June 14, 1895, to noon June 15, 1896. Attached to the said policy was a clause as follows :

"And it is further agreed that, if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel and the assured shall in consequence thereof become liable to pay and shall pay by way of damages to any other person or persons any sum or sums not exceeding, in respect of any such collision the value of the ship hereby insured, we the assurers will severally pay the assured such proportion of three-fourths of such sum or sums so paid as our respective subscriptions hereto bear to the value of the ship hereby insured, and in cases in which the liability of the ship has been contested or proceedings have been taken to limit liability with the consent in writing of two-thirds of the subscribers to this policy in amount we will also pay a like proportion of three-fourths of the costs which the assured shall thereby incur or be compelled to pay; but when both vessels are to blame, then, unless the liability of the owners of one or both of such vessels shall become limited by law, claims under this clause shall be settled on the principle of cross liabilities as if the owners of each vessel had been compelled to pay to the owners of the other of such vessels such one-half or other proportion of the latter's damages as may have been properly allowed in ascertaining the balance or sum payable by or to the assured in consequence of such collision.

Provided always that this clause shall in no case extend to any sum which the assured may become liable to pay, or shall pay, for removal of obstructions under statutory powers, for injury to harbours, wharves, piers, stages, and similar structures consequent on such collision, or in respect of the cargo or engagements of the insured vessel or for loss of life or personal injury."

On April 19, 1896, whilst the policy was in full force and effect, the Engineer came into collision with the steamship Harraton near to the entrance to the river Tees, and by reason of the collision the Engineer was considerably damaged, and the Harraton sank and became a constructive total loss. The place at which the Harraton sank was within the limits of the jurisdiction of the Tees Conservancy Commissioners, who thereupon, under their statutory powers in that behalf, took the necessary steps to remove the obstruction caused by the wreck of the Harraton. The total of the charges and expenses incurred by the commissioners amounted to £1,346. An action was begun in the Admiralty Division by the owners of the Harraton against the owners of the Engineer, and a counterclaim was entered on behalf of the respondent, but, by agreement between the parties in that action, both ships were deemed to have been in fault, and the damages suffered by both parties to the suit respectively as assessed by the registrar of the Admiralty Division, assisted by merchants, were duly paid by each to the other. The appellants, as owners of the Engineer, properly paid to the owners of the Harraton under the said agreement £673, being a moiety of the £1,346 for removing the obstruction caused by the wreck as being a loss or damage sustained by the owners of the Harraton incidental to and arising out of the collision, and thereafter the appellants sought to recover that moiety from their underwriters (including the respondent), but they declined to pay any part thereof, alleging that they were expressly excepted from liability in respect of that sum by the terms of the proviso.

The question for the determination of the court was whether the respondent was liable under the policy to pay to the appellants such proportion of the three-fourths of the sum of £673 as the respondent's subscription bore to the value of the ship. BRUCE, J., held that the case could not be distinguished from The North Britain (1) and gave judgment for the respondent, and his judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

J. Walton, Q.C., and Scrutton for the respondent.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C.—I certainly am not desirous of hearing this discussion prolonged, because for some time I have arrived at a very clear conclusion in my own mind, and I confess that I adopt the paraphrase of this contract which DAVEY, L.J., put on it in The North Britain (1). He says ([1894] P. at p. 89) that the clause means something of this kind :

"I will reimburse you, the injuring vessel, the bill which you have to pay the injured vessel for damages; but mind, I am not to be called upon to pay, directly or indirectly, for the removal of obstructions under statutory powers."

That I believe to be a very proper reading of the language which was actually used by the parties.

I agree with what DAVEY, L.J., appears to have said in respect to the mode in which that contract should be construed. In looking at a document between

A business men, I do not think that it is wise to look at technical rules of construction. I think it well to look at the whole document, to look at the subject-matter with which the parties are dealing, and then to take the words in their natural and ordinary meaning, and construe the document in that way. I have come to the conclusion that what the underwriters did mean to exclude in their contract of liability was any payment of money for the removal of obstructions to navigation. These damages, or this money payable, whichever it is to be called, comes practically within the description. It was a payment actually made by reason of the removal of an obstruction. Therefore, applying the test which I have suggested to the contract, I cannot doubt that it was what the underwriters intended to exempt from the contract into which they entered. Under those circumstances, I think that The North Britain (1) which is supposed to have governed this case now before your Lordships does govern it. I think that that case was rightly decided, and I, therefore, move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

BLAKE v. WOOLF

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Wright and Darling, JJ.), July 14, 1898]

Nuisance—Rylands v. Fletcher doctrine—Application—Escape of water from cistern supplying premises—Damage to property of tenants.

Landlord and Tenant—Liability of landlord—Escape of water from cistern—Plumber employed to repair leakage—Negligence of plumber—Damage to goods of tenants through escape of water.

The defendant was the landlord of premises let out in rooms to which he had laid on a supply of water by means of a cistern on the fourth floor with piping leading to each room. After the water had been so laid on, the plaintiff became tenant of the ground floor and basement of the premises. One Friday a leak from the cistern was discovered. The defendant was informed of the leak on the same day and immediately employed a skilled plumber to repair the cistern. The plumber did the work negligently with the consequence that when the premises were opened on the following Monday morning the ground floor and the basement were found to be flooded, and the plaintiff's goods were damaged.

Held: (i) bringing the water on the premises and maintaining a cistern there was a usual and reasonable user of the premises, and, therefore, the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher (1) (1868), L.R. 3 H.L. 330, did not apply, and, in the absence of negligence or wilfulness by the owner of the cistern he was not liable; moreover, the plaintiff had consented to the water being kept on the premises in the cistern since they had taken the ground floor and basement after the water had been laid on; (ii) the defendant, as landlord, had not been negligent since he had done all that he could do to remedy the defect and was not responsible for the acts of an independent contractor such as the plumber; accordingly, the defendant was not liable to the plaintiff.

Appeal from a decision of the deputy-judge of the City of London Court in an action by the plaintiff, Blake, against his landlord, Woolf, claiming damages of £15 for injury caused by the escape of water from a cistern.

The landlord owned 74, Wood Street in the city of London which he let out in rooms. He had laid on water to the premises, and had a cistern on the fourth floor which supplied all the rooms with water. After the water had been laid on and the cistern installed, the plaintiff became a tenant of the ground floor and basement of the premises. On a certain Friday a leakage from the cistern was discovered and on the same day the plaintiff gave notice to the defendant to repair the cistern. The defendant employed a plumber to repair the cistern but the plumber failed to repair it adequately with the consequence that when the premises were opened the following Monday morning it was found that water from the cistern had overflowed into the ground floor and basement occupied by the plaintiff, damaging his goods. The deputy-judge found that the defendant had not been negligent in employing the particular plumber he did; that the damage to the plaintiff's goods was caused by the plumber's negligence in failing to repair the defect in the cistern on the Friday, but that on the defendant receiving notice of the leakage on the Friday he became under an absolute duty to get the cistern repaired and having failed to do this he was liable to the plaintiff even though he had not himself been negligent. The defendant appealed.

H. Tindal Atkinson for the plaintiff.

WRIGHT, J.—I am not at all clear that this case is covered by any of the authorities. The question that arises is whether the landlord is liable for the damage. The first observation I make is that counsel for the plaintiff has not put his case upon any obligation arising from any express contractual liability from the relation between the parties of landlord and tenant, and there was no evidence of the terms of their tenancy. What then is the position at common law? Apart from contractual liability the rule of the common law is, I think, that laid down in Rylands v. Fletcher (1), that prima facie an occupier of land has an absolute proprietary right not to have his premises invaded by injurious matter which his neighbour keeps upon his land, and which comes from his neighbour's land otherwise than in the course of nature. That general rule is, however, qualified by some exceptions, one of which is that where a person uses his land in an ordinary and reasonable manner of use, and damage ensues to the adjoining property of his neighbour, without wilfulness or negligence, then there is no liability for such damage, and no action lies. Here the bringing of the water on to these premises and the maintaining a cistern in the usual way, seems to me to be a usual and reasonable user of the house; and, therefore, if the water escapes without any negligence or wilfulness on the part of the owner of the cistern who has brought the water there, as between the owner and the occupier, the owner is not liable.

Another exception to the general rule laid down in Rylands v. Fletcher (1), is where the party who has sustained the damage has consented to the dangerous matter being brought upon the premises, and in such a case he cannot recover. Here the plaintiff took these premises with the water laid on, and must be taken to have consented to the water being brought there, and he also consented to the water being supplied to his own part of the premises, so that he must be taken to have consented to the water being kept on the premises by the defendant in the way it was kept. Instances of this kind occur in Carstairs v. Taylor (2), Ross v. Fedden (3), Anderson v. Oppenheimer (4), and Gill v. Edouin (5).

That being so, the defendant would not be liable unless this damage was caused by his wilful default or neglect. Is there enough here to show negligence by the defendant as between landlord and tenant? It seems to me there is not. There is nothing to show that the defendant did not do all a man could do to remedy the defect. If he had attempted to repair the leakage himself he would have been guilty of the worst negligence. He, however, employed a skilled plumber to do the work, and it was in consequence of the negligence of this man or his servants that the damage was caused. Counsel for the plaintiff has contended that where the doing of anything to property is concerned a person cannot, by employing an independent contractor, get rid of liability, but is just as liable for damage caused by the negligence of the contractor as if the work were done by his own servant. I do not know of any case in which that doctrine is established. In Dalton v. Angus (6), and Hughes v. Percival (7), and the other cases cited, the person was held liable because the act complained of was the breach of an absolute right, such as the right of support, and such a right is infringed at the peril of the person infringing it. It seems to me clear from Rylands v. Fletcher (1) that there is no such absolute right here, as this case falls within the exceptions to the general rule there laid down. The ordinary doctrine, therefore, that a person is not responsible for the acts of an independent contractor, applies here, and the defendant is not liable.

It is not like the case in which the duty is a statutory duty, where, of course, the person who performs it is liable whether he performs it himself or by an independent contractor. The test in these cases is, was there negligence on the part of the defendant? I think there was none, and on that ground I think that the judgment of the learned county court judge cannot be sustained.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ.), November 18, 1896]

Bankruptcy—Property available for distribution—After-acquired property—Executory contract—Obligation to perform services.

A theatrical costumier, in consideration of the payment of a fixed sum weekly, let out on hire theatrical dresses for a fixed period, agreeing that during such period she would keep the dresses in repair and would also supply such wigs as might be required. After she had supplied the dresses to the hirer, she mortgaged her rights under the contract, but before any money had become due under the contract she was adjudicated bankrupt.

Held: as there was no liability on the hirer to pay the money unless the duties imposed by the contract on the bankrupt were fulfilled, the mortgage gave no title as against the trustee in bankruptcy to any money becoming due from the hirer after the commencement of the bankruptcy.

Appeal from a decision of LORD RUSSELL, C.J., at the trial of an interpleader issue without a jury, reported [1896] 2 Q.B. 254.

On June 10, 1895, Mrs. Ruthven, who carried on business as a theatrical costumier, entered into a contract with the Blackpool Winter Gardens and Pavilion Co. to supply dresses for a forthcoming ballet according to sketch,

“the terms to be £40 per week for twelve weeks commencing July 8, 1895, and wigs as may be required for the sum of £3 per week for the same period.

You [Mrs. Ruthven] to find all materials and to keep in repair during the run.”

The dresses were duly supplied under this contract. On July 4, by an indenture made between Mrs. Ruthven and Charles Wilmot, the plaintiff in the interpleader issue, she mortgaged to him for the consideration therein mentioned “all that her beneficial right, title, and interest,” in her contract with the said company. On July 13 a receiving order was made against Mrs. Ruthven on her own petition, and on July 26 she was adjudicated bankrupt. On Oct. 1, the company admitted that a sum of £318 18s. had become due under their contract with Mrs. Ruthven, and this sum they paid into court, an interpleader issue being directed in which Wilmot, the claimant, was plaintiff and the trustees in bankruptcy were the defendants. At the trial of the issue before LORD RUSSELL, C.J., without a jury, no evidence was given as to whether any repairs to the dresses had become necessary during the hiring, nor, if any repairs had been in fact done, as to who did them, nor was there any evidence with regard to the requirement of any wigs by the company. The Lord Chief Justice held that the case was governed by the principle of Re Jones, Ex parte Nichols (1), and he gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

Cooper Willis, Q.C. (Hawtin with him) for the plaintiff.

Herbert Reed, Q.C. (Scarlett with him) for the defendants.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case Mrs. Ruthven, a theatrical costumier, and the Blackpool Winter Gardens and Pavilion Co., entered into a contract which was concerned with the trade which she was carrying on. The business of a theatrical costumier is one of a well-known character. By this contract she agreed to design, make up, and supply to the company the costumes for a forthcoming ballet, and to keep the dresses in repair for a period of twelve weeks. She was also to supply any wigs that might be required for the same period, and was to be paid £40 a week for the dresses, and £3 a week for the wigs. Soon after entering into this contract she became bankrupt. But supposing that she had not become bankrupt, and had been compelled to sue the company for money payable under the contract, what would she have had to prove? To succeed in the action she would have been obliged to show not only that she had supplied the costumes, but that she had repaired, or was ready and willing to have repaired them, during the agreed period, and that she had supplied, or was ready and willing to have supplied, wigs as required during that period. Her claim to payment under the contract would depend upon her proving that. The date of payment being at the end of each week during the twelve weeks, it seems to me that she would have been entitled to payment at the end of each week if, at that date, she had done or had been ready and willing to do, all that she had agreed to do under the contract. But after having supplied the dresses, the contract still remained onerous on her to this extent, that she was bound to be ready and willing to do any necessary repairs to the dresses, and to supply wigs if required so to do. Those were matters to be done by her in her business as a theatrical costumier, and they would require from her the use of that talent and skill which is necessary for the carrying on of such a business. The company were entitled under the contract to require her to exercise her skill as a theatrical costumier, and she could not have transferred her duties under it to anyone else. That being so, she became bankrupt just after she had supplied the dresses, and before the company had required from her the performance of any other duties under the contract.

What was the effect of her bankruptcy? She was prevented from fulfilling the rest of her duties under the contract, and from accepting any payment under it. A trustee in bankruptcy may carry on a bankrupt's business and contracts if he thinks it beneficial to the estate, but he is not bound to do so. In this case the trustees had no talent to design and mend costumes for a ballet. They would be entitled, if they thought it beneficial to the estate, to refuse to carry on the bankrupt's business, and to disclaim the contract. Supposing that they had elected not to go on with this contract, what would have been the result? Any money due at the end of the week would perhaps have been a debt due, but it is impossible to say that the company would have been bound to pay in subsequent weeks, though they could not obtain the fulfilment of the duties which the bankrupt had agreed to perform. Since it would be only in consideration of that fulfilment that any payment would become due, the company would not be bound to pay unless the trustees had elected to go on with the performance of the contract. Therefore, at the moment of the bankruptcy no debt was due from the company. Money might or might not become payable according as certain conditions were or were not fulfilled. That seems to me to be the true view of the result of this bankruptcy. I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that the case is governed by the decision in Re Jones, Ex parte Nichols (1), and that no debt was due, because there was no liability upon the company to pay unless certain duties imposed on the bankrupt by the contract were fulfilled. Re Jones, Ex parte Nichols (1) seems to me to show decisively that these future payments, which were not debts due at the time of the bankruptcy and which would only become debts if certain conditions were fulfilled, could not be assigned by the bankrupt so as to deprive the trustees in bankruptcy of their claim under the contract. I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I base my decision upon two grounds. If this money had been a debt due at the date of the bankruptcy, I think that the argument put forward on behalf of the plaintiff would have been correct. But, in order to determine whether it was, we must consider the words of the contract which the Master of the Rolls has already fully explained. It seems to me that the money might, or might not, have become a debt due in the future, and that the case therefore comes within the decision in Re Jones, Ex parte Nichols (1). I should like to refer also to Re Davis & Co., Ex parte Rawlings (2). FRY, L.J., at the end of his judgment says (22 Q.B.D. at p. 199):

“Then it is said that the payments which became due from the hirers under the hiring agreements after the bankruptcy were not capable of being validly assigned as against the trustee on the authority of Ex parte Nichols (1). But that case has no bearing on the present, for that which was assigned in the present case was a debt due at the date of the assignment, though it was not payable until a future time. In Ex parte Nichols (1) nothing was due to the bankrupts at the date of the assignment, but they attempted to assign a debt which might become due to the trustee in their bankruptcy at a future time. They had nothing to assign.”

Those observations seem to me to be most applicable in the present case. But it appears to me that there is another ground upon which this case may be decided. Assuming that the goods referred to in the contract were in existence at the date of the bankruptcy, the general property in them would pass to the trustees in bankruptcy, while the special property would remain in the hirers. The result is that the bankrupt had no property at all in them. That also seems to me to be a strong reason why we should affirm the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, and dismiss this appeal.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree. I rest my judgment exclusively on the reasons that have been given by the Lord Chief Justice. I think that the present case is decided by the judgment in Re Jones, Ex parte Nichols (1), with which it is identical in principle. This is not a case in which the bankrupt has assigned her interest in a contract of which her part had been executed, so that the whole amount which she could claim under the contract must become payable to her. Here the contract is executory, so that the consideration would not be earned by her unless she continued to carry on her business of theatrical costumier, so that she might be able to perform her duties under the contract. The carrying on of her business was an important factor. Where, as here, only part of the bankrupt's duties under the contract have been performed, the bankrupt cannot create any greater rights in favour of an assignee than she already has. The trustees in bankruptcy were, therefore, entitled to claim the moneys which might ultimately become due under the contract. I think that that is a fair statement of the matter.

On looking at the terms of the contract it is clear that the bankrupt could not have fulfilled her part of the bargain without continuing to carry on a costumier's business. She was prevented by her bankruptcy from carrying on that business, because it passed into the hands of her trustees. If any repairs to the dresses had been required they would have been done, if at all, by the trustees who would in such a case be entitled to the whole consideration. But there is no need to inquire what did in fact happen with regard to repairs to the dresses. I think that the nature of the contract is to be determined from the terms of the contract itself, and not from the mode in which it accidentally happened to be carried out. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., LOPES and CHITTY, L.J.J.), reported [1897] 1 Q.B. 625, reversing a decision of CHARLES, J., reported [1897] 1 Q.B. 384.

The action was for a mandamus commanding the defendants (respondents in the present appeal) to cause to be made such sewers as might be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of the Public Health Act, 1875, and to give facilities for enabling the plaintiffs to carry the liquid proceeding from their factories or manufacturing processes into the sewers under their control. The action was begun by Philip Cadell Peebles (since deceased) who owned and carried on the business of paper making at a factory called the Whiteash Paper Mill, and before it was instituted Mr. Peebles requested the respondents, and the respondents refused, to provide sewers for the reception of the liquids from the paper mill.

The claim was based on the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 15 and 21 of which imposed on a local authority the duty of providing a proper sewage system. The respondents, however, contended that such obligation was not one towards the appellants or any individual occupier, but for the benefit and purposes of the whole district. They also relied upon s. 299 of the Act, which prescribed, as the remedy in such a case, complaint to the Local Government Board. That remedy, the respondents urged, was the only and exclusive one in case of any default by them.

The relevant sections of the Act were as follows :

“Section 15. Every local authority shall keep in repair all sewers belonging to them, and shall cause to be made such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of this Act.”

Section 21 entitled owners and occupiers within the district to cause their drains to empty into the sewers, subject to certain conditions as to notice and otherwise.

“Section 299. Where complaint is made to the Local Government Board that a local authority has made default in providing their district with sufficient sewers . . . the Local Government Board, if satisfied after due inquiry that the authority has been guilty of the alleged default, shall make an order limiting a time for the performance of their duty in the matter of such complaint. If such duty is not performed by the time limited in the order, such order may be enforced by writ of mandamus, or the Local Government Board may appoint some person to perform such duty. . . .”

The case came before CHARLES, J., in November, 1896, when it was arranged that the question of law should be argued before any evidence was gone into. CHARLES, J., granted the mandamus, but his decision was reversed on appeal.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and C. A. Russell, Q.C., appeared for the appellants.
J. Walton, Q.C., and Danckwerts for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

April 28, 1898. The following opinions were read.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C.—The question on this appeal is whether a mandamus which was ordered to issue by CHARLES, J., can be supported. According to that learned judge’s views it was a mandamus

“commanding the defendants to cause to be made such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining their district under the Public Health Act, 1875, and in particular the plaintiffs’ premises.”

I think it right to call attention to the language the learned judge uses, because I am of opinion that it is the key to what I consider to be the error which the learned judge committed in the course of the judgment which he delivered in this case. Your Lordships will observe that the first part of that mandamus, “for effectually draining their district under the Public Health Act, 1875,” follows the language of the statute. Then he has put in this in addition—“and in particular the plaintiffs’ premises.” In the view which I take of the statute, that was a provision which there was no authority to add to the mandamus at all. There is no such provision in the statute, and it appears to me that the whole purview, object, and purpose of the statute is one which would not justify such an addition to the language of the mandamus.

The principle upon which the question arises that where a specific remedy is given, it thereby deprives the person who insists upon a remedy of any other form of remedy than that given by the statute, is one which is very familiar, and which runs through the law. I think LORD TENTERDEN, C.J., accurately states that principle in Doe d. Bishop of Rochester v. Bridges (1). He says (1 B. & Ad. at p. 859):

“Where an Act creates an obligation and enforces the performance in a specified manner, we take it to be a general rule that performance cannot be enforced in any other manner.”

The words which the learned judge uses there appear to be strictly applicable to this case. The obligation which is created by this statute is an obligation which is created by the statute and by the statute alone. It is nothing to the purpose to say A that there were other statutes which created similar obligations, because all those statutes are repealed; you must take your stand upon the statute in question, and the statute which creates the obligation is the statute to which one must look to see if there is a specified remedy contained in it. There is a specified remedy contained in it, which is an application to the proper government department.

It seems to me that, if it were possible to conceive a case in which it would be B extremely inconvenient that each suitor in turn should be permitted to apply for a specific remedy against the body charged with the care of the health of the inhabitants of the district in respect of drainage, it is such a case as this; and it is illustrated by the form of the mandamus. When I called the attention of the C learned counsel to the form of the mandamus, he treated the observation as if it were a question of some mistake made in the pleadings which would be remedied as a matter of course in these days. But that was not the object of the observation, nor is it the importance of the observation. It is that the obligation itself is such that the form of the mandamus becomes of the substance of the argument. You cannot get out of the form of the mandamus. I know no other form which could be adopted than that which has been adopted. But then that shows how important it D is that the particular jurisdiction to call upon the whole district to reform their mode of dealing with sewage and drainage should not be in the hands, and should not be open to the litigation, of any particular individual, but should be committed to a government department.

It appears to me that that is enough to dispose of this appeal, because I entirely concur in the judgment of the Court of Appeal, in which it is pointed out that this E comes within the very familiar principle of law to which I have called attention.
But counsel for the respondents undoubtedly raised another question, upon which I will say a word, although I should be sorry to rest my judgment upon that different head of inquiry; and for this reason: it involves a question of fact. Looking at the pleadings, it is logically impossible to deny that upon the pleadings the appellants put themselves out of court by their own allegations, namely, that the insufficiency F of the drainage here is an insufficiency which only applies to the particular applicant for a mandamus by reason of its being insufficient for him, and therefore brings the matter within the exact words of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876. But although I think that is logically irresistible upon the pleadings—and it is impossible for the appellant to deny that on the face of the pleadings he has put himself out of court in that respect by showing that it is only because of his additional manufactory G that the system of drainage is insufficient—yet I should be reluctant to base my judgment on that argument, because it involves really a question of fact which ought not to be concluded by a mere logical application of the pleadings. I confess, however, that I am wholly unable to see the answer to the argument at present, if the facts are what the pleadings appear to admit them to be, because, instead of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act having, as counsel for the appellants ingeniously H argued, reference to a different subject-matter, this appears to me to be the very subject-matter that the legislature was dealing with there.

The preamble of that Act recites that it is expedient to make “provision for the prevention of the pollution of rivers,” and having that object before it, the legislature has obviously intended to look at the system by which the public health is preserved in respect of sewers and drains. What does it then provide? It I provides that there shall be an outlet in some form or other for what I may call manufactory refuse; but contemplating the case which might readily arise where some manufacturer would be very glad to throw upon the rates the necessity of getting rid of his own refuse, it provides also, with reference to that obligation to get rid of the refuse, that where the drainage system of a district is “only sufficient for the requirements of their district,” there shall not be an obligation to get rid of the refuse of a manufacturer who ought to get rid of the refuse which he is himself creating. That seems to me to be a very intelligible provision, and a very just one; otherwise a manufacturer might come to some very small district, might establish a large manufactory there which would involve, with reference to the law of nuisance, the necessity of getting rid of the refuse created by that manufactory, and there would be no individual obligation upon the person creating it. But if this section in the Public Health Act could be applied in the way in which it is sought to apply it here, nothing could be easier than for a manufacturer to establish a manufactory for his own profit and throw upon the rates, paid by all the inhabitants, who have no concern with the manufactory at all, the necessity for providing for that great source of expense to the manufacturer of getting rid of his own refuse.

It seems to me, therefore, that the legislature very wisely and prudently provided against such a condition of things as that, and if that condition of things exists here as a fact—as upon the pleadings I think it is admitted that it does—I see no answer to the argument that the section in question would not entitle anybody to call upon the particular district to provide for the extra amount of refuse created by the manufacturer. But, as I have said, I wish to rest my judgment upon the familiar ground upon which the Court of Appeal proceeded—that this is the only remedy provided by the statute for a new obligation created by the statute itself. At the same time I thought it right to go into the other point also, because I see no answer to the argument counsel for the respondents presented. For these reasons I move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. Assuming that the appellants have a just cause of complaint against the Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council, founded on s. 15 of the Public Health Act, 1875, it seems to me to be plain that they can have no remedy outside that Act. The law is stated nowhere more clearly, nor, I think, more accurately, than by LORD TENTERDEN, C.J., in the passage cited by the Lord Chancellor. Whether the general rule is to prevail, or an exception to the general rule is to be admitted in any particular case, must depend on the scope and language of the Act, and considerations of policy and convenience. It would be difficult to conceive any case in which there could be less reason for departing from the general rule than one like the present. And I must say I am much more impressed by the forcible language of JAMES, L.J., in Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board (2), where he is pointing out the waste of time and money and the great inconvenience which would result from recourse to ordinary legal proceedings in such a case, than by his suggestion of the propriety of an application to the Queen's Bench Division for a mandamus. The evils of litigation would, I think, be much the same in the one case as in the other.

Besides relying on the expressions which fell from JAMES, L.J., in reference to a remedy by mandamus, the learned counsel for the appellant pointed out that LORD ESHER, M.R., was not strictly accurate in saying that the obligation imposed by s. 15 of the Act of 1875 was a new obligation. The obligation, he said, existed under the earlier Acts relating to public health. That is quite true. The Act of 1866, indeed, provided a special remedy by an application to the Secretary of State. But in the previous legislation there seems to have been no special remedy provided. Whether the absence of a special remedy in the particular case would justify recourse to legal proceedings is, I think, at least doubtful. The case, perhaps, would properly be an exception to the general rule laid down in LORD TENTERDEN's second proposition in the passage which follows that which my noble and learned friend has just read, in which he says (1 B. & Ad. at p. 859):

“If an obligation is created, but no mode of enforcing its performance is ordained, the common law may in general find a mode suited to the particular nature of the case.”

But, however that may be, the real answer to counsel for the appellants' argument is, that the obligation from the first was a statutory obligation—it did not exist at common law—and the view of LORD ESHER that it was a new obligation imposed by the Act of 1875 is substantially accurate. The earlier legislation in relation to public health was tentative and experimental. The Act of 1875 is not a consolidating and amending Act. It sweeps away all the previous legislation, and makes a fresh start. It is not, therefore, incorrect to say that the obligation is a new obligation. There is nothing, I think, in the point that the Local Government Board might have to determine a question of construction. I do not see why they should not. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

BULKELEY v. STEPHENS

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Stirling, J.), March 26, April 28, 1896]

Will—Apportionment—Tenant for life and remainderman—Sale of investments after death of tenant for life—Apportionment of proceeds of sale—Apportionment Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict., c. 35), ss. 2, 3, 4, 5.

Where a dividend is received by trustees after the death of a tenant for life it is apportionable between the tenant for life and the remainderman in accordance with the Apportionment Act, 1870, but where the trustees sell the investments after the death of the tenant for life and before receiving the dividend in general the proceeds of sale will not be apportionable either in equity or under the Apportionment Act. If, however, the trust instrument directs the distribution of the investments in specie after the death of the tenant for life (so that, if the trust were carried out, his estate would be entitled to an apportionment of the next dividend received), but the court orders the trustees to sell the investments with the result that no such dividend is in fact received, an apportionment of the proceeds of sale ought to be made by the trustees.

C Application on behalf of the surviving trustee of the will of the testator, Mr. Lyne-Stephens, that he might be at liberty, out of funds in his hands, being income of the said testator's residuary estate, to pay to the legal personal representative of Mrs. Lyne-Stephens, the late tenant for life, the sum of £61 1s. 6d., being the proportionate part of £5,525, the dividend of  $4\frac{1}{4}$  per cent. on £130,000 bank stock, part of the said residuary estate, which accrued from Aug. 31, 1894, to Sept. 2, 1894, and that he might also be at liberty to pay to such legal personal representative D a proportionate part of the dividends on £12,000 Royal Exchange Assurance Corp'n. Stock, further part of the said residuary estate, which was sold by order of the court, which accrued up to the said Sept. 2, 1894. As to the bank stock no difficulty occurred.

E The testator, who made his will in 1851 and died in 1860, gave all his residuary estate to trustees upon trust for sale and conversion, and for investment in certain specified securities, namely, parliamentary stocks or public funds of Great Britain, or at interest on government or real securities in England or Wales, with power to vary such investments. Then followed a beneficial trust in favour of his wife during her life, which continued thus :

F "And from and immediately after the decease of my said wife upon trust to pay, transfer, and assign my said residuary estate, and the stocks, funds, and securities upon which the same shall be invested, unto and among such of the issue of my uncle, William Lyne, and of my deceased uncles, the Rev. Richard Lyne, Edward Lyne, and Joseph Lyne, as shall be living at my decease (excepting two therein mentioned), share and share alike."

Then followed a power to retain moneys in existing investments.

G Mr. Lyne-Stephens, the tenant for life, died on Sept. 2, 1894, and on Nov. 12 an order was made, on the application of the trustees, that certain inquiries should be made, and it was ordered that the trustees be at liberty to sell the £12,000 Royal Exchange Stock and to pay the proceeds of such stock into court. On Dec. 31, 1894, a dividend was declared by the assurance corporation, which was an interim dividend at about £4 per cent. on that stock. That dividend came to the hands of H the trustees, and on Jan. 29, 1895, the stock was sold pursuant to the order of Nov. 12, 1894. In the following June a dividend was declared by the corporation at £10 per cent. (amounting therefore to £1,200) on the stock for the year ending Dec. 31, 1894. The question arose whether the legal personal representative of Mrs. Lyne-Stephens was entitled to participate in these dividends.

April 28, 1896. STIRLING, J., stated the facts and continued : As regards the bank stock the dividends came to the hands of the trustees, and it is not disputed that the legal personal representative of Mrs. Lyne-Stephens is entitled to a proportionate part so come to the hands of the trustees. Neither is it disputed that the Royal Exchange Corp'n. is a public company within s. 5 of the Apportionment Act, 1870, and that the interim dividend actually came to the hands of the trustees so far as to make it apportionable under the Act, and therefore that a proper share ought to be paid to the legal personal representative of the tenant for life.

As regards the dividend which was declared in June, 1895, it is contended on behalf of the legal personal representative that the price received by the trustees includes that dividend, and that as much thereof as represents that dividend down to the death of the tenant for life ought to be paid to him. From an abstract point of view there is much to be said in favour of it, but there is considerable difficulty in its practical application.

This is not the first time the point has been considered by the court; at least a similar one as to apportionment of income on change of investment has been twice considered, first in Scholefield v. Redfern (1), and second in Freman v. Whitbread (2). In the former case the Vice-Chancellor says (2 Drew. & Sm. at p. 182):

“There is another question of a peculiar kind, and one which is novel to me. The point will be best explained by putting an example. Suppose part of the testator’s property to consist of certain American stock, bearing interest or dividends payable at half-yearly periods, say January and July, and the trustees sell it in order to invest the proceeds on consols, if they sell it at any other time than precisely the period at which a dividend has just accrued, the money realised by the sale is so much more in proportion to the time which has elapsed since the last dividend day. Therefore the amount realised by the sale is compounded partly of the value of the stock itself, and partly of the value of that proportionate part of the current half-year’s dividend, which may be considered to have accrued since the last dividend day. It is contended that the tenant for life ought to have this latter portion as income. Now it is certain that, in the multitude of cases of administration of estates in modern times where similar directions have been given by testators, the court has never been in the habit of administering any such equity. When we consider a little further, it is obvious, that, if the tenant for life is to have something out of the sale money, as representing income, then when the trustees invest the money, unless they invest it on the very day on which the dividend has just accrued due, the same equity ought to be administered the other way, and we ought to take from the tenant for life something of his next dividend on the consols, and add that to the capital, in order to make things equal as between him and the remainderman. It is clear that if there is an equity one way there is an equity the other way. It is obvious that the reason why such equity on either side has never been administered habitually by this court is that, by attempting it, a grievous burden would be imposed upon the estates of testators by reason of the complex investigation which it would lead to. The gain to either party would be far more than compensated by the expense which might be incurred in a complicated case, and for that reason no doubt the thing has never been done. I will not be the first to introduce the practice.”

In the second case of Freman v. Whitbread (2), the Vice-Chancellor delivered a long and elaborate judgment, in which the subject may be said to be exhausted. I simply refer to it because it amplifies the reasoning contained in the first case.

Both these decisions were before the Apportionment Act, 1870, and it is necessary therefore to consider the effect of that Act. Section 2 provides, among other things, that dividends “shall, like interest on money lent, be considered as accruing from day to day, and shall be apportionable in respect of time accordingly.”

So far as that is concerned I think that the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor is not affected, because at the conclusion of Scholefield v. Redfern (1) he says (2 Drew. & Sm. at p. 183):

“But it was suggested that, though this may be so with regard to stock, the dividends of which are payable at the end of each successive half-year,

A a different rule is applicable to the case of railway debentures and other property of that description yielding interest de die in diem. If anything is received as interest, that interest will belong to the tenant for life; but if the debenture is sold for a given sum, that sum must be treated as capital."

3 But the matter does not stop there. The Act not merely declares that they shall be apportionable, but provides for the time of payment and the remedies for their recovery. Section 3 runs :

C "The apportioned part of any such rent, annuity, dividend, or other payment, shall be payable or recoverable in the case of a continuing rent, annuity, or other such payment, when the entire portion of which such apportioned part shall form part shall become due and payable and not before, and in the case of a rent, annuity, or other such payment determined by re-entry, death, or otherwise when the next entire portion of the same would have been payable if the same had not so determined and not before."

Section 4 :

D "All persons and their respective heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and also the executors, administrators, and assigns respectively of persons whose interests determine with their own deaths, shall have such or the same remedies at law and in equity for recovering such apportioned parts as aforesaid when payable (allowing proportionate parts of all just allowances) as they respectively would have had for recovering such entire portions as aforesaid if entitled thereto respectively. . . ."

E It is said that the trustees have received the dividends within the meaning of these sections, and so that they are liable to account to the legal personal representative of the tenant for life for a proportionate part. But, in point of fact, they were received by the purchaser, and it is admitted by the applicant that, the stock having been sold with the dividend, the legal personal representative has no rights against the purchaser. What the trustees have received is purchase money. The stock was sold cum dividend. This is not an actual dividend, and so these sections do not apply directly.

F Therefore the legal personal representative is entitled to insist as against the trustees on an equity merely, which is what the Vice-Chancellor declined to enforce in the cases before him. The reasons given by him were, first, the absence of any practical scheme for giving effect to it; and, second, the great burden it would put on trust properties. The first applies here, and no case has been cited in which effect has been so given. I have inquired as to the practice in the registrar's office, and I am informed that no such practice is recognised in dealing with ordinary funds directed to be sold on the death of the tenant for life. As to the second reason, the burden is not so great as it would be on a change of investment, because, first, the alleged right would arise on re-investment, both as to the original investment and the re-investment; and, secondly, because a change of investment is different from the distribution of the trust fund. Still, the burden will be considerable. If the legal personal representatives were to receive so much of the purchase money as represents the value of the proportionate part of the dividend, it would mean that the dividend would have to be treated as if it were actually paid. This might in many cases entail considerable labour, and the evidence of stockbrokers and other experts would be necessary in order to ascertain the price at which the stock would be sold ex dividend, and the difference between that and the actual price would represent the dividend. It would become necessary to obtain and to preserve such evidence. And if, as in this case, the tenant for life were dead, and had a legal personal representative, other difficulties might possibly arise. The consequence is, that in many cases they would have to come to the court for protection. Again, in cases of companies, payment would almost always be delayed, or the amount might not in certain circumstances be payable for a long time. Looking at all these circumstances, I am not prepared to introduce any novel practice on the sale of shares consequent on the death of the tenant for life. A

It is, however, upon the whole clear that in some cases, such as those dealt with by the Vice-Chancellor, effect has been given to such a scheme under special circumstances; e.g., as in Lord Londesborough v. Somerville (3), and Bulkeley v. Stephens (4). I think here that it is a material circumstance that the trust is on the death of the tenant for life B

“to pay, transfer, and assign my said residuary estate and the stocks, funds, and securities upon which the same shall be invested, unto and amongst”

a particular class of beneficiaries. There is also a trust for sale, but that is varied by a power to retain in existing investments for so long as his trustees in their absolute discretion should think fit. But it occurs to me that the trust or power for sale is given not at the death of the tenant for life, but that the proper mode then for executing the trust is to transfer in specie the stocks, funds, and securities, etc., to the beneficiaries. The Apportionment Act would have applied directly if that had been done on the death of the tenant for life, and the legal personal representative would have been entitled to a proportionate part. But it so happened in this case that the beneficiaries were very numerous, the estate being divided into ninety-thirds, and consequently the trust cannot be carried out in that way. If, however, it had been so carried out, the duty of the trustees was to transfer, so that the legal personal representative of the tenant for life should be able either directly or through the intervention of the trustees to obtain payment of the proportionate part of the dividend to which he is entitled. C D E

Now the order of Nov. 12, 1894, was made, and I doubt not properly made, for the sale and division of the proceeds of the estate. It was made in the interest and for the benefit of the persons who then became entitled to receive that estate. But it was made in the absence of the legal personal representative of Mrs. Lyne-Stephens. If he had been present it seems to me it would have been urged by him that her estate ought not to be placed in a worse position than if the trust had been carried out in the proper mode by transfer. That being so, I do not see why, as the estate is not finally wound-up, he may not still assert the same right, and under these circumstances I have come to the conclusion that the application ought to be acceded to, assuming that the parties are all satisfied that the proper sum, which would have been allowed on such an application, is that which is mentioned in the summons. Local Authority—Byelaw—Reasonableness—Prohibition of obscene language on “land adjacent” to public place—No requirement of proof of annoyance to public.

A county council acting under the powers conferred by s. 16 of the Local Government Act, 1888 [now s. 249 of the Local Government Act, 1933], to make byelaws “for the good rule and government of the county” passed the following byelaw: “No person shall in any street or public place, or on land adjacent thereto, sing or recite any profane or obscene song or ballad, or use any profane or obscene language.”

Held: the application of the byelaw to “land adjacent” to a public place went beyond what was necessary for the “good government” of the county, for a person singing or reciting on such land might be out of the hearing of the public; those words were severable, but even if they had been struck out, there was nothing to require that the doing of the prohibited acts must be an annoyance to the public, as was required for similar provisions in the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, and, therefore, the byelaw was unreasonable and invalid.

At a petty sessions held for the petty sessional division of Worcester at the Shirehall, on Aug. 20, 1895, an information was preferred by the respondent, Alfred Hayes, a police sergeant of the county of Worcester, against the appellant, Henry Strickland, alleging that the said Strickland, on July 2, 1895, did unlawfully use certain obscene language in a public place at North Hallow, in the county of Worcester, contrary to the byelaws of the Worcestershire County Council. It was proved on behalf of the informant that the obscene language complained of was used by the appellant on a footpath in a field, and that a large number of persons were present. A

In 1894 the Worcestershire County Council, under the powers conferred by s. 16 of the Local Government Act, 1888, made certain byelaws expressed to be "for the good rule and government of the county," and such byelaws were sent to a Secretary of State for approval, under s. 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, and not disallowed. No. 3 of such byelaws, under which the present information was laid, was as follows: B

"No person shall in any street or public place, or on land adjacent thereto, sing or recite any profane or obscene song or ballad, or use any profane or obscene language." C

Byelaw 11 was as follows:

"Any person who shall offend against any of the foregoing byelaws shall be liable on a summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for each such offence." D

At the hearing several objections to the validity of the byelaw were raised by the appellant, but for the purposes of this case two only were material, viz.: (i) that the byelaw was unreasonable on the ground that it included land adjacent to a public place; and (ii) that it was unreasonable and repugnant to the general law of the land, inasmuch as it contained an absolute prohibition of profane and obscene language under all circumstances without qualification, and was not limited, as were the offences mentioned in s. 28 of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, to cases where annoyance is caused to the public by such language. E

By s. 16 of the Local Government Act, 1888, a county council had the same power of making byelaws in relation to their county as the council of a borough had of making byelaws in relation to their borough under s. 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. By s. 23 (1) of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, the council might from time to time make such byelaws as to them seem meet for the good rule and government of the borough, and for the prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner by virtue of any Act in force throughout the borough. F

The magistrates decided that the byelaw under which the information was laid was not ultra vires, not unreasonable, and not repugnant to the general law of the land, and they convicted and fined the appellant subject to this Case. G

Channell, Q.C. (Brooke Little with him) for the respondent.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In this case the question is whether a byelaw under which the appellant was convicted is valid or not. Several objections were raised against the byelaw, some of which are untenable. For example, it was said that the sanction of the Local Government Board was required under s. 184 of the Public Health Act, 1875 [repealed]. That objection is disposed of by the Act under which this byelaw was made, viz., the Municipal Corporation Act, 1882, by s. 28 of which the consent of a Secretary of State is made sufficient. H

The really important point, however, was this. This byelaw, it was said, was unreasonable, and not in accordance with the existing law of the land, because it goes too far and constitutes an entirely new offence. That is a formidable objection, for, although we have no sympathy with people who want to sing obscene songs, it is nevertheless important for us to see that any byelaws made to prevent it do not go beyond the powers given by the legislature for that purpose. The Act of Parliament, under the authority of which this byelaw was framed, is the I

A Municipal Corporation Act, 1882, s. 23, and I am unable to find that the county council has any power under that Act to make byelaws beyond what are required "for the good rule and government" of the county. Byelaws are not to be made merely to spell out the dislikes of members of the council. They must be really for the better government of the county. I have no hesitation in saying that the byelaw in question goes too far. The words "on land adjacent" to a public place go far beyond what is necessary for the good government of the county. The effect of such a law might be that a person might be convicted of using bad language in a stable or any other place near a highway, although no person could possibly have heard him. Such a provision might open the door to considerable tyranny, and in my judgment it goes too far.

C It does not follow, however, that the rest of the byelaws must be bad also. There is plenty of authority to show that a byelaw may be severed, and if one part of it is good, that part may be enforced although the rest may be bad. There is no difficulty in striking out the words "or on land adjacent thereto," and reading the byelaw with those words omitted. But if that is done, one is immediately struck by the fact that there is not a word in the byelaw to require that the doing of the prohibited thing must be in any way an annoyance to the public. Some D such words invariably form part of any similar provisions in Acts of Parliament, as in the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, s. 28. That Act shows that the legislature did not intend to make the singing of an objectionable song in a public place an offence, if it were sung, as it easily might be, in a place where there was not a soul to hear it. It has been suggested that the byelaw implies of necessity E that the offence causes annoyance to the public. But I agree with the answer of counsel for the appellant, that all that is required for a conviction is to prove that the offence specified in the byelaw has been committed, and that offence is complete under this byelaw, whether any person could hear or not. I think, therefore, that it cannot be supported in its present form, although a slight alteration in the wording might put it right.

F KAY, L.J.—I confess I should have been glad if this byelaw and conviction could have been supported, because in this case the foolish person who was convicted did in fact use the obscene language in the presence of a large number of people; and if the byelaw had been so worded as to confine its operation to persons behaving like the appellant, I should have said it was a perfectly proper byelaw. G But we have to deal with an Act of Parliament which enables the county council to frame byelaws for the "good rule and government" of the county, and if we were to hold that this byelaw was valid, we should have similar byelaws made by county councils throughout the country. If we compare this byelaw with the provisions of Acts of Parliament dealing with similar subjects we find that words which are always present in those Acts are omitted in the byelaw.

H Take for example s. 28 of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847. The prohibitions in that section are guarded by such words as "to the annoyance of the public." That Act does not make the utterance of obscene language in streets an offence unless it is done to the annoyance of the public. Can it be right that, rejecting the ordinary form of laws on this subject, a county council should make a byelaw in these wide terms when they have only power to make byelaws for the better I government of the county? It appears to me impossible to avoid the conclusion that it would be an infringement of the byelaw although no human being heard or could hear what was said. If a man were to give himself up and confess having used such language when alone, that would be sufficient evidence of an infringement of this byelaw.

And then, again, when we compare it with Acts of Parliament dealing with streets, we find that the words requiring the condition of annoyance are omitted. Why are they omitted, but because it was intended that the byelaw should be in wider terms than the statute? Counsel for the respondent has ingeniously argued that the presence of words making annoyance of the essence of the offence ought to be implied in such a byelaw as this. But the fact remains that no such words are to be found in this byelaw, although such words do appear in the Acts of Parliament. Moreover, I think counsel for the appellant was right in his contention that the man has a right to insist that the offence of which he is convicted should be clearly stated in the byelaw. There are no words in it making annoyance a condition of the offence, and he has a right to demand that they shall not be implied. I think, therefore, the conviction must be set aside, and I can only express a hope that the council will reframe their byelaw in more careful language.

PENNY v. WIMBLEDON URBAN COUNCIL D

[COURT OF APPEAL (A. L. Smith, Vaughan Williams and Romer, L.JJ.), May 4, 1899]

Highway—Negligence—Work done negligently by contractor employed by local authority under statutory powers—Liability of local authority.

A district council, in exercise of their powers under s. 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875 [now ss. 189, 190 of the Highways Act, 1959] employed a contractor to make up a street which was not a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. The contractor in the course of the work left heaps of soil by the side of the street without any protection or lights. The plaintiff at night fell over one of the heaps and was injured. In an action for damages brought by the plaintiff against the district council and the contractor, F

Held: it was the duty of the district council to take precautions to prevent the work which was being done by their order from being dangerous to the public, and, therefore, they were liable for the neglect of that duty by the contractor. G

Per VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.: In cases such as this in which the local authority has statutory powers to do something to a road, e.g., stopping it or opening it up, so as to make it dangerous for use, it is clear that there is a duty upon the local authority to take care that, whatever they are doing under their statutory authority, the Queen's subjects are not injured by a careless performance of the work. H

Practice—Payment into court—Separate defences by two defendants—Payment-in by one defendant—Sum recovered by plaintiff less than payment-in—Liability of other defendant for costs—R.S.C. Ord. 22, r. 1.

Where there are two defendants to an action and both deny liability and put in separate defences, but one defendant with his denial pays a sum of money into court which exceeds the sum eventually recovered by the plaintiff in the action, the other defendant cannot avail himself of his co-defendant's payment-in in satisfaction of the cause of action against himself, and the plaintiff will be entitled to an order against him for costs if the defence fails. I

The district council and the contractor delivered separate defences. The contractor denied liability and paid £75 into court; the district council denied liability and further pleaded that the contractor, "while denying liability, has paid £75 into court, and these defendants say that that sum is sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim." The plaintiff obtained a verdict for £50.

Held: the district council could not rely upon the payment into court by the contractor and judgment must be entered against them for costs.

Appeal by the defendants, the Wimbledon Urban District Council, from a decision of BRUCE, J., [1898] 2 Q.B. 212, on further consideration, after trial with a jury in Middlesex. A

The action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by her through falling over a heap of soil placed by the defendant Iles in the Queen's Road, Wimbledon. The Queen's Road was a road within the district of the Wimbledon Urban District Council. For some considerable time before the accident to the plaintiff this road had been set out as a road by the owner of the land, and had been used by the public, but it had not become a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. The district council had given notice, under s. 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to the owner requiring him to sewer, level, pave, metal, flag, channel, and make good the road. The requirements of that notice were not complied with, and the district council proceeded to carry out the work under the powers conferred on them by s. 150. B

The district council entered into a contract with the defendant Iles, who was a contractor, to do the work. In the course of doing the work Iles placed heaps of soil, which had been removed from the surface of the road, by the side of the road. These heaps of soil were not lighted or in any way protected. The plaintiff was crossing the road at night in order to get to the road in which she lived, and fell over one of the heaps and was injured. D

This action was brought against the district council and Iles. The defendant Iles delivered a separate defence, denying that the accident was caused by his negligence, and with his defence paid £75 into court with a denial of liability. The district council in their defence denied the negligence, and further alleged that they were not liable for any negligence of Iles; they further said : E

The action was tried before BRUCE, J., with a jury, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £50. The learned judge then ordered judgment to be entered for the defendant Iles. Upon further consideration BRUCE, J., held that the defendant Iles was the agent or servant of the district council and was not an independent contractor, that the district council were liable even if Iles was an independent contractor, and that the district council could not avail themselves of the payment into court by Iles. The learned judge ordered judgment to be entered against the district council, to be confined to costs. The Wimbledon Urban District Council appealed. F

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of BRUCE, J., after the trial of the action with a jury. The result of the trial was a verdict for the plaintiff for £50. What happened was this: The plaintiff was at night crossing a road which was being obstructed by a contractor employed by the Wimbledon Urban District Council. The jury have found that there was negligence in leaving the obstructions unfenced and unlighted. The plaintiff fell over one of the obstructions and was injured. This action was brought against the contractor and the district council to recover damages. H

The first question which arises is upon the form of the pleadings, which is somewhat novel. The contractor, in his defence, pleaded that there was no negligence, and while denying liability paid into court the sum of £75 as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim. The district council set up the defence that there was no negligence, and also a quite different defence that Iles was an independent contractor, and that they were not liable for his negligence; they also pleaded that :

"The defendant Iles, while denying liability, has paid into court £75, and these defendants say that that sum is sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim."

The action went to trial. The plaintiff succeeded on the issue as to negligence and got a verdict for £50. The contractor then said that he had paid £75 into court and thereupon became entitled to judgment; and BRUCE, J., ordered judgment to be entered for him.

Then came the question as to the defence of the district council that they had employed an independent contractor. That point was argued before BRUCE, J., who gave a considered judgment and came to the conclusion that the defence was not a good defence. What was then the position of the district council? They had, as principals, been guilty of negligence, and were responsible for the acts of their contractor. They had not paid any money into court. What answer could they then have to the plaintiff? In my opinion, none. If Iles had not paid the money into court, the plaintiff could have recovered the £50 from the district council. The plaintiff could not get the money twice over, but she had a good cause of action against the district council and succeeded against them.

Therefore, BRUCE, J., was quite right in his judgment upon that point. Then there is the other point raised by the council, that they are not liable for the acts of the contractor, because he was an independent contractor, and what was done by him was casual or collateral negligence for which the principal could not be made liable. In my opinion BRUCE, J., stated the case with perfect accuracy when he said:

"The district council employed the contractor to do work upon the surface of a road which they knew was being used by the public, and they must have known that the works which were to be executed would cause some obstruction to the traffic, and some danger, unless means were taken to give due warning to the public."

That is a perfectly accurate and good statement. Then as to the law BRUCE, J., said:

"The principle of the decisions, I think, is this—that when a person employs a contractor to do work in a place where the public are in the habit of passing, which work will, unless precautions are taken, cause danger to the public, an obligation is thrown upon the person who orders the work to be done to see that the necessary precautions are taken, and that if the necessary precautions are not taken, he cannot escape liability by seeking to throw the blame on the contractor."

I agree with every word of that statement, and would add to it, unless the acts done were mere casual or collateral acts of negligence, such as the dropping of a hammer by a workman. I cannot hold that leaving heaps of material about the street was either casual or collateral negligence within the above exception. For these reasons I think that the decision of BRUCE, J., was right both as to the form of the judgment and as to the liability of the district council. The appeal fails and must be dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree. As to the first point, the fallacy lies very much in the words by which it is attempted to define the so-called defence in this case. When a defendant pays money into court with a denial of liability, that is done in pursuance of Ord. 22, r. 1. Let us then see what that rule says. It provides that:

"Where an action is brought to recover a debt or damages, any defendant may, before or at the time of delivering his defence, or at any later time by leave of the court or a judge, pay into court a sum of money by way of satisfaction, which shall be taken to admit the claim or cause of action in respect of which the payment is made; or he may, with a defence denying liability (except in actions or counterclaims for libel or slander), pay money into court which shall be subject to the provisions of r. 6."

I desire to point out that the defence is the denial of liability, and not, as has been assumed by the defendant council, the payment into court. The importance of that is this. Both defendants have delivered statements of defence; each of them has denied liability; one of them chose also to pay money into court, and, according to the terms of the rule, he had to do that with his defence. What is the result? The result is not that he sets up a defence by the payment into court, but that the legislature for the sake of peace has enabled a defendant to make an offer of terms of peace. The result of that procedure is that, if at the trial the defendant who has paid money into court is defeated upon his denial of liability, yet he is not placed in the position of a defeated defendant if the plaintiff does not recover more than the amount paid into court. In that case, notwithstanding his defeat on the denial of liability, the defendant saves the costs of the action and gets judgment for his costs. It is therefore a mistake to say that there is a defence of payment into court. The only defence is the denial of liability. Here the one defendant by his payment into court has improved his position, because he gets the benefit of that payment into court, the plaintiff not having recovered more. I cannot, however, see any reason why the other defendant, who did not make any payment into court, should be placed in the same position as the defendant who did pay money into court. It is quite plain, therefore, that King v. Hoare (1) and Brinsmead v. Harrison (2) have no application to the present case. There never was any satisfaction of the cause of action before or during the trial; there was always a good cause of action against the Wimbledon District Council. In my judgment, BRUCE, J., was perfectly right in entering judgment against the district council.

As to the other point, there is rarely any question of liability upon which the authorities are so clear and so uniform as they are with regard to the liability of a local authority which has employed a contractor as in the present case. The principle was first laid down in Pickard v. Smith (3). That was a case in the Court of Common Pleas, where in the judgment it was said (10 C.B.N.S. at p. 480):

"Unquestionably, no one can be made liable for an act or breach of duty, unless it be traceable to himself or his servant or servants in the course of his or their employment. Consequently, if an independent contractor is employed to do a lawful act, and in the course of the work he or his servants commit some casual act of negligence, the employer is not answerable. To this effect are many authorities which are referred to in the argument. That rule is, however, inapplicable to cases in which the act which occasions the injury is one which the contractor was employed to do; nor, by parity of reasoning, to cases in which the contractor is intrusted with the performance of a duty incumbent upon his employer, and neglects its fulfilment, whereby an injury is occasioned."

Those principles were subsequently applied in Gray v. Pullen (4), Bower v. Peate (5), and Dalton v. Angus (6). Then, last of all, the principle was again applied in Hardaker v. Idle District Council (7).

In all those cases the principle applied was that, if a contractor was intrusted with the performance of the duty of the employer, the employer could not rely upon the employment of the contractor in order to escape liability if the duty was not performed. In cases such as this, in which the local authority has statutory powers to do something to a road, e.g., stopping it or opening it up, so as to make it dangerous for use, it is clear that there is a duty upon the local authority to take care that, whatever they are doing under their statutory authority, the Queen's subjects are not injured by a careless performance of the work. Apply that prin-

A ciple to the present case. This road was being made up, and that work must at some time give rise to danger. It was, therefore, the duty of the statutory authority to take care, by providing fencing, lights, or watchmen, that persons coming there were not injured. Here it happened that those precautions were not taken, and the plaintiff was injured. Therefore I think that here, as in Pickard v. Smith (3), there was a duty incumbent upon his employer which was intrusted to the contractor, who neglected its fulfilment, whereby an injury was occasioned to the plaintiff. BRUCE, J., has expressed the law tersely, and with absolute accuracy, and I entirely agree with his judgment. The appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—Having regard to the present state of the authorities, I think that the following statement accurately expresses the law upon this question: Where a person, through a contractor, does work which from its nature is likely to cause danger to others, there is a duty on his part to take all reasonable precautions against such dangers, and he does not escape liability for the discharge of that duty by employing a contractor if the contractor does not take those precautions. I desire to point out that what has been called in some cases casual or collateral negligence refers to accidents which cannot be guarded against beforehand. Applying that rule to the present case I think that this work from its very nature was likely to cause danger to the public, because it became necessary, and indeed inevitable, in doing the work that heaps should be made. It is well known that, in works like this, it is a usual precaution to put up lights or other warnings. In my opinion it would not be reasonable not to take such precautions.

As to the second point, I have nothing to add except to call attention to the fact that this case is not one in which the district council have set up substantially the same defence as the other defendant, and have submitted to the same consequences as if money had been paid into court by them. I agree, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed.

I Variation of Settlement—Power of appointment—Divorced wife—Wife's power of appointment to husband—Remainder to children in default of appointment—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict., c. 61), s. 5.

Under a marriage settlement the wife, whose marriage had been dissolved on the ground of her adultery, had a power to appoint by will the annual income of a fund to the husband for life if he should survive her, and in default of appointment and on the wife's death, the fund would go to the children of the marriage. This was the husband's only interest under the settlement in the wife's property.

Held: when the breaking up of the family life had been caused by the fault of the respondent (in this case the wife), the court, exercising its powers under s. 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 [now s. 25 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950], ought to place the petitioner and the children in a position, as nearly as circumstances might permit, as if the family life had not been broken up; accordingly, as the wife, had the marriage continued, would in all probability have exercised the power of appointment in the husband's favour, the court had power to order that the income of the fund be paid to the husband for his life after the wife's death.

Motion on behalf of the petitioner Edward H. Hartopp, to confirm with certain alterations the registrar's report on a petition for the variation of a marriage settlement made on the petitioner's marriage with the respondent, Helen Margaret Georgiana Hartopp.

The report was as follows:—On June 13, 1898, the decree nisi obtained by the petitioner dissolving his marriage with the respondent by reason of her adultery was made absolute. There were now living eight children, issue of the marriage, in the custody of the petitioner, none of whom had attained the age of twenty-one or married. By an indenture of settlement, bearing date Aug. 12, 1878, made in contemplation of the marriage, certain trust funds and interests were held by the trustees in trust for the respondent for life, and on her death for the children as she should appoint, and in default of appointment for the children equally. There were further trusts in the event of no child of the marriage attaining the age of twenty-one years. It was therein further provided that, if the respondent should survive the petitioner, it should be lawful for her, after the death of the petitioner but without prejudice to any appointment in favour of the children of the marriage, to appoint in favour of a future husband and the children of a second marriage to the extent of one-third of the trust funds in the event of more than one child, issue of the marriage between the petitioner and the respondent, attaining the age of twenty-one years. In the event of the petitioner surviving the respondent, the respondent had power to appoint by will a sum not exceeding £500 a year to the petitioner for life, but, in default of the exercise of that power, the petitioner had no interest in the trust funds on the death of the respondent. Her interest in that fund came to her on her mother's death under the will of her grandfather. It consisted of £10,452 consols, producing £277 a year. No property was brought into settlement by the petitioner.

Counsel on behalf of both parties and of the trustees of the settlement attended before the registrar, and it was agreed that the respondent's present income was £997 per annum, to be increased to £2,274 on the death of her mother, who was now seventy years of age, and that the income of the petitioner, apart from any profit derived from his business as a South African merchant, was about £200 per annum. It was sworn by the petitioner that since the commencement of his business in partnership in January, 1895, he had only been able to draw £409 6s. 10d., and that there was little prospect of any further receipts owing to the depression of business in South Africa. The petitioner attended pursuant to notice, but counsel on behalf of the respondent did not cross-examine him. If the petitioner was charged with the average receipts from the business, his income would be about £340 per annum. It was contended by counsel on behalf of the petitioner that Noel v. Noel (1) was an authority for appropriating half the respondent's income for the benefit of the petitioner (being the husband) and the children, regardless of the amount of the petitioner's income.

It was submitted that, although in Noel v. Noel (1) the trustees were ordered to pay half the income arising from the wife's trust funds to the husband, it was after consideration of their several incomes and other circumstances, and that the decision was not a general authority for the proposition; but in this case, having regard to the number of the children, it was submitted that it would be right that the court should order that, until the death of the mother of the respondent, the trustees should pay to the petitioner half the income arising from the trust funds, and from and after the death of the respondent's mother and during the lifetime of the respondent the annual sum of £1,000, and on the death of the respondent the annual sum of £500, and further order that the respondent should not be at liberty to appoint in favour of a second husband whom she might marry during the petitioner's life, nor in favour of children of a subsequent marriage born during the lifetime of the petitioner, and that the respondent's power of appointment amongst the children of the marriage between the petitioner and respondent be extinguished, and that the trustees be at liberty to exercise the powers of advancement in favour of the children without the consent of the respondent, provided that the loss of capital be borne proportionately by the petitioner and respondent.

By s. 45 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 :

“In any case in which the court shall pronounce a sentence of divorce or judicial separation for adultery of the wife, if it shall be made to appear to the court that the wife is entitled to any property either in possession or reversion, it shall be lawful for the court, if it shall think proper, to order such settlement as it shall think reasonable to be made of such property or any part thereof, for the benefit of the innocent party, and of the children of the marriage, or either or any of them.”

By s. 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 :

“The court, after a final decree of nullity of marriage or dissolution of marriage, may inquire into the existence of ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree, and may make such orders with reference to the application of the whole or a portion of the property settled either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of their respective parents as to the court shall seem fit."

Jan. 27, 1899. GORELL BARNES, J., read the following judgment.—In this case, the marriage between the petitioner and respondent has been dissolved on the ground of the respondent's adultery, the decree absolute having been pronounced on the husband's petition on June 13, 1898, and the petitioner was given the custody of the children of the marriage. The husband having presented a petition for the variation of an ante-nuptial marriage settlement made on Aug. 12, 1878, with the sanction of the Court of Chancery, the respondent being at that time a ward of court, the registrar has made his report recommending as follows: That the court should order that, until the death of the mother of the respondent, the trustees should pay to the petitioner half the income arising from the trust funds, and from and after the death of the respondent's mother and during the lifetime of the respondent, the annual sum of £1,000; that the respondent should not be at liberty to appoint in favour of a second husband whom she may marry during the petitioner's life, nor in favour of children of a subsequent marriage born during the lifetime of the petitioner; that the respondent's power of appointment amongst the children of the marriage be extinguished; and that the trustees be at liberty to exercise the powers of advancement in favour of the children without the consent of the respondent, provided that the loss of capital be borne proportionately by the petitioner and respondent.

On motion before me, the petitioner desired to have the report varied by increasing the amount to be paid to him after the death of the respondent's mother from £1,000 per annum to half of the annual income of the trust funds. He was willing, however, that the amount to be paid to him from time to time should be paid to him as to one-third for his own use and two-thirds for the benefit of the children. The increase was, however, opposed by the respondent. After due consideration of all the circumstances of the case, and especially of the fact that the petitioner has to support and bring up the children, I am of opinion that the £1,000 should be increased to one-half of the annual income of the trust funds, with a direction that the amount to be paid is to be applied in manner aforesaid. The respondent sought to have the report varied in so far as it deals with her power of appointment in favour of any future husband and children of a future marriage, but I am of opinion that the report should be confirmed on this point. If the power of appointment can be read as giving the respondent power to appoint in favour of any husband she may marry during the petitioner's lifetime and of any children of a future marriage born in his lifetime it is not desirable that the respondent should be able to exercise the power in question to the detriment of her present children in a manner which she could not have done had she remained the wife of the petitioner. I may refer on this point to the observations of LORD HANNEN in Noel v. Noel (1) (10 P.D. at p. 182). The respondent also objected to the extinguishment of her power of appointment among the children of the marriage, and to the exercise by the trustees of the power of advancement in favour of the children without her consent; but, as she will no longer have charge of the children, she has not the same opportunity of exercising a judgment as to the propriety of making any particular disposition of her property among them, or as to the exercise of the powers of advancement, as if she had continued in charge of them, and the report must be confirmed on this point also.

The principal difficulty in the case arose from an application by the petitioner on the motion that the settlement be varied by ordering that the petitioner should be entitled to receive after the respondent's death the income derived from a fund coming under the will of the respondent's grandfather, referred to in the settlement, which is now represented by a sum of about £10,000 in consols. Under the settlement, the respondent takes a life interest in it, and after her death it goes to the children of the marriage, subject to a power given by the settlement to the respondent to appoint by will or codicil the annual income of this fund in favour of the petitioner for his life. If this power should not be exercised, the petitioner has no interest under the settlement in the settled property. It was objected by the respondent that the court had no power to make such an order, as it would affect the interests of the children under the settlement, and the case was adjourned in order that a representative of the children should appear and argue the matter on their behalf.

A guardian ad litem of the children was, accordingly, appointed, and the case was re-argued on this point. Counsel on behalf of the children took the same objection, and relied on Crisp v. Crisp (2); Forsyth v. Forsyth (3); and Pollard v. Pollard (4). The petitioner's counsel maintained that the court has power to make the order prayed, and relied on s. 45 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and s. 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859. I do not propose to comment on s. 45 of the first Act, but to base my judgment on s. 5 of the second Act. Section 5 is as follows: [His LORDSHIP read the section, and continued:] This section is in very general terms, and under it the court is expressly given power to make such orders with reference to the whole or a portion of the property settled either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of their respective parents as to the court may seem fit. I feel little doubt that, under this section, the court has power to make the order prayed for, and, indeed, counsel for the children seemed to feel the difficulty of maintaining that the language of the section is not sufficient to give the court this power; but it was urged that, in the cases above mentioned, a construction has been placed on the section to the effect that the court has no power to vary a marriage settlement so as to deprive children of the marriage of any interest secured to them by the settlement, and that the petitioner is asking the court to make an order which will deprive the children of the petitioner and respondent of interests secured to them by the settlement in question.

The guiding principle which will be found running through the cases is, in my opinion, this. When the breaking up of the family life has been caused by the fault of the respondent, the court, exercising its powers under the above section, ought to place the petitioner and the children in a position, as nearly as circumstances will permit, the same as if the family life had not been broken up. It follows that, when the trust funds are settled, as is usual, on the parents successively, or on one of them for life, with remainder to the children, the court, while it might extinguish the whole or a part of the guilty parent's life interest and his or her power of appointment, if any, amongst the children, would not interfere to deprive the children of those interests to which they are entitled under the settlement. In such cases, whether the home is broken up or not, the children, on attaining the age fixed by the settlement, or sometimes, in the case of daughters, on their marrying, have interests which will certainly come to them as soon as the prior life interests end. Crisp v. Crisp (2) was a case which may have been determined from this point of view, though it is possible that, if that case had been heard since the passing of the Judicature Acts, the court might have considered it had power to make the order agreed on, had it chosen to do so. In Forsyth v. Forsyth (3), the children who might attain twenty-one or marry became absolutely entitled to the trust funds after the death of the respondent. In Pollard v. Pollard (4), the settlement gave the wife, on the death of her husband, a power of appointment in favour of a second husband and the children of a second marriage, and the wife, who had obtained a divorce against her husband, sought to have the settlement varied, so as to enable her to exercise the power before her husband's death, but the President declined to do so. In Hipwell v. Hipwell (5), the children's reversionary interests were affected by an order that the petitioner's costs should be paid out of the corpus.

In the present case, the children became entitled to the fund aforesaid on attaining twenty-one, or, if daughters, on marrying, subject, however, to the wife's life interest, which will have been partially dealt with by the order of the court, and subject to her power of appointment aforesaid. So that, if the respondent should exercise that power, to the extent to which she does so the benefit to be derived by the children from the fund is postponed till after their father's death—that is to say, the children's interests vary according as the power is exercised or not. If the family life had continued, it is most natural to expect, in the petitioner's circumstances and as he had no interest in his wife's money conferred by the settlement except so far as she might give him a benefit by the exercise of the power in question, that, if she should have died before him, she would have left a will exercising the power in his favour.

The position, then, is that, if no order be made, the children will, after what has happened, almost certainly obtain their full interests after their mother's death, whereas, if the marriage had continued in the ordinary way, they would most likely only have obtained those interests on the death of both parents. At any rate, it may be said that the children's interests, as conferred by the settlement, are not absolute, but are liable to be affected by the exercise of the power in question. There is a state of uncertainty which, in the position of the parties to this suit, it is reasonable to expect would have been determined in favour of the husband had the family life continued, and, in my opinion, the court has power, and it is reasonable, to determine it in his favour in the circumstances which have happened. The trustees of the settlement did not appear and argue the point before the court, but counsel for the respondent stated that he was authorised on their behalf to say that they did not desire to be heard.

In the result, the sum of £1,000 must be increased to one-half of the respondent's income after her mother's death during the respondent's lifetime, and one-third of the amounts to be paid to the petitioner during his life is to be paid to him for his own use, and two-thirds of the said amounts are to be paid to him for the use of the children while he has the custody of them. As each child attains twenty-one or, if a daughter, marries, the proper share of the said two-thirds applicable to such child, according to the number of the children, shall be paid to him or her. The income of the fund coming under the will of the grandfather of the respondent, not exceeding £500 a year, must be paid, after the respondent's death and subject to any interests prior to hers, to the petitioner during his lifetime. The report will be varied in this way, and in other respects confirmed.

Licence—Breach—Licence not coupled with an interest—Grant by parol agreement—Use of wall for erection of hoarding for advertising—Annual rent paid to owner—Right of licensee to maintain action for breach of contract.

The defendant verbally agreed to let the plaintiff have the use of a wall for advertising by bill posting on a yearly tenancy at an annual rent, the plaintiff to erect a hoarding. The plaintiff erected a hoarding, displayed posters thereon, and paid the rent for some years. The defendant gave the plaintiff notice to remove the hoarding and soon afterwards he removed it himself. In an action by the plaintiff for breach of contract,

Held: although the plaintiff had a mere licence not coupled with an interest which the defendant could revoke at any time without being liable to an action for trespass, the right of the defendant as licensor to revoke and the right of the plaintiff as licensee to sue for breach of contract in respect of such revocation, were co-existent, and, therefore, the plaintiff could maintain an action for breach of contract.

Appeal by the plaintiff from the county court of Surrey, held at Wandsworth, in an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract.

The plaintiff, an advertising agent, proved that the defendant, in March, 1892, verbally agreed to let him have the use of a wall for advertising by bill posting, as a yearly tenant, at £2 10s. a year, upon the plaintiff agreeing to board it and erect the hoarding. The plaintiff agreed to these terms, and erected the hoarding, and paid the rent, down to October, 1896. In November, 1896, the defendant gave to the plaintiff notice to remove the hoarding, and at the end of December the defendant removed the hoarding himself. The plaintiff brought an action for damages for breach of contract for terminating the agreement.

The county court judge held, on the authority of Wood v. Leadbitter (1), that, as the plaintiff was a mere licensee, no action was maintainable; and he gave judgment for the defendant with costs. The plaintiff appealed.

Turrell for the plaintiff.

LAWRANCE, J.—In this case I am of the opinion that the county court judge was wrong. He seems to have decided the case on the authority of Wood v. Leadbitter (1), and to have thought that, as the plaintiff had only a licence granted to him, Wood v. Leadbitter (1) was an end of the whole case, and that he could go no further. There is no case exactly on all-fours with this, as all the cases referred to are for trespass on the case, or such like causes of action. The present action, however, is for breach of contract, and I think upon the facts the plaintiff would be entitled to maintain such an action. Under these circumstances the case must go back to the county court judge to say what the contract was, and to assess the damages.

HENN COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The county court judge in this case assumed that the right to revoke the licence which existed was in itself enough to determine this action. The case was argued on the basis that this was a licence and nothing more, and I, therefore, deal with it on that ground. It was a licence or a contract by which the plaintiff was to put up certain hoarding, and the defendant was to allow it to remain there if the plaintiff paid for it annually. That was the evidence on which the licence was set up for the plaintiff. That being so, and it being conceded that the person who granted this right has the right to revoke it, the point arises whether, if it has been revoked, the plaintiff, to whom such right was granted, can maintain an action, not for revoking the licence, but for breach by the defendant of his contract. It is rather curious that there is no case which has decided that these two rights—the right on the one hand to revoke the licence, and the right, on the other hand, to maintain an action for breach of contract for doing so—co-existed. It seems to me, however, on principle that these two rights must exist, and that several of the authorities really involve this principle. Turning to Wood v. Leadbitter (1), ALDERSON, B., in delivering the judgment of the court, says (13 M. & W. at p. 855):

“It was suggested that, in the present case a distinction might exist, by reason of the plaintiffs having paid a valuable consideration for the privilege of going on the stand. But this fact makes no difference; whether it may give the plaintiff a right of action against those from whom he purchased the ticket, or those who authorised its being issued and sold to him, is a point not necessary to be discussed; any such action would be founded on a breach of contract, and would not be the result of his having acquired by the ticket a right of going upon the stand, in spite of the owner of the soil.”

In fact I read that as showing that that cause of action, namely, an action for breach of contract, would exist, and there are two cases which seem to me to proceed on that footing.

The first is Wells v. Kingston-upon-Hull Corpn. (2). In that case the facts were that the defendants were possessed of a graving dock, of which they allowed the use to ships needing repairs under certain regulations. The plaintiff entered into a parol agreement with the defendants for the use of the dock upon the terms of such regulations. By those regulations it was provided that the dock should be "let" to parties requiring the same for the repair of vessels, at such rates as should be sanctioned, and that vessels should be allowed to enter the dock as far as possible according to order of entry in a book kept for that purpose. The defendants did not admit the plaintiff's vessel into the dock in her turn, and in an action for breach of contract by the plaintiff against the defendants, it was held that the contract was not for an interest in land within s. 4 of the Statute of Frauds, and therefore, need not be in writing. In the argument for the defendants it was put in this way: "The plaintiff is in this dilemma: If the licence to occupy the dock is revocable, it was revoked. If it was irrevocable, it must be because it was a licence coupled with an interest. What interest can there be but an interest in the land?" In dealing with this argument, LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in his judgment says (L.R. 10 C.P. at p. 409):

"Here I think the defendants did not intend to confer any interest in land, though they did give the plaintiff a right to go on to the land in order to carry out the contract. I do not think we are called on to discuss the nice question raised upon the effect of Wood v. Leadbitter (1) in counsel's ingenious argument, namely, as to whether the plaintiff was a licensee without an interest, and so must fail, because the licence had been revoked; or a licensee with an interest, and so the licence, being irrevocable, amounted to an interest in land. The dilemma suggested does not, as I think, arise. The contract did not relate to the possession or enjoyment of the land, or any right over it, but only to the use of it under very stringent regulations, the defendants retaining themselves complete possession of and all rights over it."

That seems to me to narrow down the right of the plaintiff in that case to that of a mere licensee, and it seems to me, therefore, that the actual decision in that case is a decision in favour of the plaintiff's contention in this case.

There is also another case in which the same point arose, namely, Butler v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Rail. Co. (3), where the plaintiff was a passenger by the defendant's railway, and where the ticket issued to him incorporated by reference certain conditions, one of which was that every passenger should show and deliver up his ticket when required by a servant of the company to do so, or failing or refusing to show or deliver up such ticket, should be required to pay the fare from the station whence the train originally started. The plaintiff, having lost his ticket, was unable to produce it when required to do so, and he was thereupon required to pay the fare from the station whence the train had started, and, on his declining to do so, he was forcibly removed from the carriage, no more force being used than was necessary for his removal. He thereupon sued the defendants for assault, and the court held that the contract between the plaintiff and the defendants did not authorize the defendants to remove the plaintiff under the circumstances, and that the action was maintainable. That being an action for assault, Wood v. Leadbitter (1) was accordingly referred to and relied on in the argument of defendants' counsel, and was dealt with by the court. LORD ESHER, M.R., says (21 Q.B.D. at p. 211):

"To say that a passenger by railway from London to Liverpool is to have an easement all over the line between those places seems to me really ridiculous. . . . It seems to me, therefore, that the considerations upon which the case of Wood v. Leadbitter (1) turned are not applicable in this case";

and, in a previous part of his judgment, he says (ibid.):

"What is the nature of the relation between the plaintiff and the defendants? It is, as it appears to me a contractual relation."

LINDLEY, L.J., says (ibid. at p. 213) :

“It seems to me to be a totally different thing from a contract for an interest in land; and it seems to me absurd to treat the case as one of revocable licence. It is a case of a contract for carriage. The doctrine of Wood v. Leadbitter (1) does not appear to me to be at all applicable to the case of such a contract;”

and LOPES, L.J., gives judgment to the same effect, and they all distinguish the case from Wood v. Leadbitter (1).

From that it appears that what the court has to look at is, what is the whole contract between the parties? The cases cited for the defendant differ from the present, and are easily distinguishable. They were actions of trespass, or on the case, and they seem to me to be no authority for the proposition that the right to maintain an action for the wrongful interference with the plaintiff's rights under the contract may not subsist with the defendant's right to revoke the licence. In CLERK AND LINDSELL ON TORTS (1st Edn.) at p. 278 [see now 12th Edn. at para. 1166] it is said, when dealing with such a revocable licence :

“The licensee cannot after revocation justify entering upon the land for the purpose of using the privilege; his only remedy against his licensor, where the revocation is wrongful, is upon the contract.”

In the case of a licence not coupled with an interest, it would be a strong thing to say that when such a licence is revoked the licensee would have no cause of action on the contract. The mere fact that the licence was revoked does not exclude the right to sue upon the contract.

Appeal by the Crown from a decision of the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland (LORD ROBERTSON, LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ADAM, and LORD KINNEAR), reversing a decision of the Lord Ordinary (LORD WELLWOOD).

The Crown claimed account stamp duty, or succession duty in respect of sums received under certain policies of life assurance gratuitously assigned by the party insured, the premiums on which had been paid by the respondent since 1883.

James Fleming, who resided at Cupar, in the county of Fife, died there on Feb. 18, 1890. On Feb. 21, 1840, he effected a policy on his life for £300 with the Scottish Equitable Life Assurance Society; and on April 9, 1860, he acquired right by assignment to a policy for £250 effected on his life with the same society on Dec. 4, 1840. He kept up these policies, and regularly paid the premiums as they fell due, until Sept. 29, 1883. He then assigned both policies gratuitously to his daughter the respondent, Mrs. Robertson. After that date the premiums were paid by her, and on his death she received from the society the principal sums contained in the policies and the bonuses which had accrued. The claim, which in these circumstances was made for account stamp duty, was based upon the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38, as amended by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, s. 11. The action contained a conclusion against the respondent Mrs. Robertson for delivery of an account of the moneys received by her under the policy, or of part of such moneys received by her in proportion to the premiums paid by the deceased. On Dec. 12, 1894, the Lord Ordinary decided on this point in favour of the Crown, holding that there was liability for duty in the proportion which the premiums paid by the deceased bore to the whole premiums paid on the policies.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—It appears to me that in this case there is a plain interpretation to be put upon plain words. I am only reiterating what has been said over and over again in dealing with taxing Acts, when I say that we have no governing principle of the Act to look at; we have simply to go on the Act itself to see whether the duty claimed under it is that which the legislature has enacted. This claim has been put in two ways. It appears to me that it is susceptible of a very simple answer in respect of either of them.

The first question is, whether it comes under s. 2, of the Succession Duty Act, 1853:

“Every past or future disposition of property, by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, either immediately or after any interval. . . .”

This policy of insurance has been in existence a considerable number of years. The person entitled ultimately to this money, herself in one sense created the property—that is, she continued the contract under which, if she continued to pay premiums, certain money would be payable upon the death. She continued that for a period of seven years; and therefore, reading simply the words as they stand, I do not think that she has “become beneficially entitled . . . upon the death of any person;” because she has become entitled by reason—among other things—of her own payments during the period of seven years; and it appears to me, under that section, that in order to make this a “succession” we must introduce some words of this kind: “disposition of property by reason whereof either partly or wholly a person has become entitled.” If those words were introduced, in a certain sense it is true that she did partly become entitled by reason of premiums previously paid, the policy effected, and the assignment then made, supposing she continued to pay the premiums. But I find no such words in the statute, and I decline to do anything else than construe the words which I find there. I therefore am of opinion that under that part of the statute it is impossible to maintain the claim of the Crown on this first ground.

I then turn to the alternative claim, which is for account duty; and it appears to me that it is susceptible of an equally plain answer. I do not know that I can state it more plainly than LORD ADAM has done. He says:

“I confess I have never been able to understand in this case how a policy of insurance could be kept up for the benefit of a donee when no donee was in existence.”

Here, again, in order to apply the tax to the particular case in dispute, one must introduce words into the statute such as: “for the benefit of any existing or future donee, or person who may become a donee.” I find no such words. Unless you introduce by construction those words into the statute it is impossible, as LORD ADAM says, to understand how it could be kept up for the benefit of a donee, when no donee was in existence. I agree with him. The Lord Ordinary’s view seems to have been that, the moment a policy of insurance is taken out, the person who takes out the policy keeps it up not only for his own benefit, but for the benefit of some possible donee at a future time. That really is an essential condition of the construction contended for by the Crown; and I am unable to agree with that construction. Under these circumstances, I think that this appeal should be dismissed with costs, and the interlocutors affirmed; and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The first question is, whether the money payable under the policies was property to which the lady became entitled on the death of her father, by reason of the disposition which he made when he assigned the policies to her. I do not intend to lay down any principle, or to say anything applicable to any case but the one with which we are dealing. I shall solely consider whether that comes within the words of the enactment or not. In my opinion it does not. I do not think that it is accurate to say that the sum payable by the insurance company became hers by reason of the disposition which her father made. It is admitted that the entire sum cannot be said to have become hers by reason of that disposition; she would never have got it but for the fact that the premiums continued to be paid upon the policy. Therefore, the suggestion is that it must be split up into two portions—the one to be attributed to the payment of premiums by her father before the donation; the other to be attributed to the payment of premiums by her afterwards; and that, being so divided, upon the former of those sums the duty would be payable. I can find nothing in the words of the Act to warrant and give support to such a contention. For these reasons I think that the appeal entirely fails, so far as the Succession Duty Act, 1853, is concerned.

Then it is said that account duty was payable by virtue of the Customs and Inland Revenue Acts, s. 38 of the Act of 1881, as amended by s. 11 of the Act of 1889. In order to bring the case within those statutes, it is necessary to show that the policy, the duty on the proceeds of which is in question, has been either “wholly kept up” “for the benefit of the donee”—which of course is not the case here—or has been partially kept up for the benefit of the donee. In my opinion it would be really an abuse of words to say that the policy was “kept up for the benefit of the donee” at the time when payments were being made by the father of the lady, not for her benefit, as far as appears, or for anybody’s benefit but his own. The contention is that, because he afterwards creates a donee, the payment of premiums which he made when for aught that appears he had no donee at all in his mind—I do not mean merely any individual donee, but no notion of creating a donee—must be regarded, if he creates a donee, as having been made for her benefit. I do not think that it is reasonable to treat the language of the Act of Parliament in that way. I think that it would really be not using the words of the statute, but abusing them, if we put such a construction upon them.

LORD MORRIS.—I concur.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion, and while quite concurring in what has fallen from your Lordships, I think that the grounds of judgment have been very clearly and accurately stated by the learned Lord President and LORD ADAM in the Court of Session.

SMITH v. SMITH

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY (Sir Francis Jeune, P.), December 21, 1897]

On a wife's petition for permanent maintenance it was found that the husband's income was £972 a year and that he was entitled to a reversionary interest on the death of his mother, the present value of which was about £5,434. The wife had no separate means and had the custody of the only child. On a motion to vary the registrar's report the question arose as to the insertion of a dum sola et casta clause.

Held: a clause dum sola vixerit might be inserted without the addition of “et casta” in an order for permanent maintenance, and the husband would be ordered to secure the wife £350 a year for life, with an additional £50 a year, limited dum sola vixerit, when the reversion fell in, and £100 a year for the child until the age of twenty-one, without security.

Notes. For the power of the court to award maintenance in a case of divorce under s. 19 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, see 29 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 407.

As to the dum sola et casta clause, see 12 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 438, and for cases see 27 DIGEST (Repl.) 625 et seq.

Case referred to in argument:

Motion upon registrar's report as to permanent maintenance of former wife and allowance for the child of the dissolved marriage.

The registrar reported that on Aug. 25, 1897, the decree nisi obtained by the petitioner, Florence Smith, dissolving her marriage with the respondent, William Smith, on the grounds of his cruelty and adultery, was made absolute; and there was one child of the marriage, aged seven, and that alimony, pending suit, was paid at the rate of £220 per annum. The respondent admitted a present income of £972 10s., of which £857 10s. was derived from interest on a loan to his brother of £18,500 on security of certain indentures of mortgage less the interest on a charge of £1,500. The respondent also possessed a reversionary interest in a one-sixth share of £47,955, expectant on the death of his mother, who was then sixty-two years of age. The present value was stated to be about £5,434. The respondent alleged that the petitioner was about to be married to a man who had an income of £200 to £300 a year. The petitioner had no income of her own.

The report recommended that the respondent secure, by deed, the payment to the petitioner of an annual sum of £400 for life for her maintenance, and the further annual sum of £100 for the maintenance of the child, until twenty-one.

The respondent gave formal notice of objections to the report on the grounds (inter alia):—(i) That the annual sum of £400 for the petitioner and £100 for the child exceeded one half of the respondent's actual income. (ii) That the registrar should not have taken into account the reversion from which no income was derived by the respondent. (iii) That he should have taken into account the value of certain furniture and effects given to the petitioner at the time of the separation of the parties. (iv) That a dum sola et casta clause should be inserted. (v) Or, in the alternative, that the amount secured should be diminished on petitioner's future marriage.

Bargrave Deane, Q.C., and R. W. Turner for the respondent.

SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P.—I am inclined to think that this additional £50 a year to the petitioner may very fairly be postponed and made contingent upon the falling in of the respondent's reversionary interest. I also think that it should be limited till the petitioner marry again. It is always difficult to decide the question as to insertion or omission of the clause of limitation in these cases. I never could see, however, why one should not, if desirable, insert one part of the clause without the other. It is sometimes argued that the insertion of the dum casta clause casts a slur upon the former wife, but I do not think it was ever meant to impute anything at all. It was put in in the old forms, and no doubt the two parts usually run together. I do not see, however, why they are bound always to do so. In the present case I am of opinion that a fair order will be that the respondent secure to the petitioner for her life £350 a year, to be increased by £50 a year on the respondent's reversion falling in, the additional £50 to be limited dum sola vixerit. The deed will be prepared in the usual way. In regard to the child, the registrar recommends that the amount of £100 be also secured. That is not usual. The allowance for the child will be ordered to be paid by the respondent, without giving security in respect thereof.

The holder of an off-licence for the sale of beer, wines, and spirits in respect of certain premises successfully applied for a renewal of the licence at the annual licensing meeting. At the same meeting he applied for the grant of a new licence in respect of other premises in the same district, and the justices granted the application on condition that he would surrender the licence which had just been renewed and this he agreed to do.

Held: this was not an order for removal under s. 50 of the Licensing Act, 1872 [now s. 25 of the Licensing Act, 1953, as amended by the Licensing Act, 1961, Sched. 9, Part II], and the justices had validly exercised their discretion in granting the licence on this condition.

Notes. The Licensing Act, 1872, has been repealed. Section 50 of the 1872 Act corresponds to s. 25 of the Licensing Act, 1953 (as amended by the Licensing Act, 1961, Sched. 9, Part II).

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal, [1898] 1 Q.B. 334, affirming an order of the Queen's Bench Division, [1897] 2 Q.B. 308, making absolute an order for certiorari to remove into the Queen's Bench Division and quash a licence or certificate granted to the appellant, George Coulson Laceby, by the Licensing Justices for the licensing division of Wandsworth on Mar. 26, 1897. D

The respondents were lessees of the premises known as the "Five Alls," at 567, Battersea Park Road, Battersea, and the appellant was the underlessee. An off-licence had first been granted in respect of these premises in 1878 and had been renewed thereafter. In 1887 the appellant acquired the freehold in the premises adjoining the "Five Alls" at 2, Abercrombie Street. In 1890 an off-licence was granted to the appellant's sister in respect of the cellar of the premises at 2, Abercrombie Street and this licence had been renewed thereafter. With the permission of the then lessee a doorway was constructed between these two premises. The licences in respect of both these premises were transferred to the appellant on Sept. 29, 1893. In Feb. 1897, the appellant gave notice to the overseers of the poor for the parish of Battersea, the superintendent of police of the district, and the justices, in the appropriate form, of an intended application by him at the general annual licensing meeting for the division of Wandsworth, to be held on Mar. 5, 1897, for a certificate authorising him to sell by retail beer, wines, and spirits to be drunk or consumed off the premises at 2, Abercrombie Street. This application was not to be limited to the cellar, but was to extend to the whole premises. E

At the general annual licensing meeting on Mar. 5, 1897, the existing licences for 567, Battersea Park Road, and the cellar of No. 2, Abercrombie Street were renewed. After the licences had been renewed the appellant, by his solicitor, applied for a certificate for a new licence for No. 2, Abercrombie Street, for which he had given notice. In reply to a question from the justices, and after consideration, the appellants' solicitor said that the appellant would, if the licence was granted to No. 2, Abercrombie Street, not restricted to the cellar, give up the licence for No. 567, Battersea Park Road, which had that day been renewed to him. The further consideration of the application having been adjourned the justices, on Mar. 19, 1897, viewed the houses No. 567, Battersea Park Road, and No. 2, Abercrombie Street. F

On Mar. 26, 1897, the application again came before the justices, when counsel appeared for the respondents and claimed a right to be heard in opposition to the application. An objection was raised to his being heard by the appellant's solicitor on the ground that he had no locus standi, but the justices overruled the objection and counsel for the respondents was heard at full length, and the case was heard and argued upon the merits. On the conclusion of the arguments the chairman of the G justices delivered the decision of the Bench to the effect that the licence would be granted on condition that the licence for 567, Battersea Park Road was given up. On April 13, 1897, the respondents applied before GRANTHAM and WRIGHT, JJ., for a rule calling on the appellant and the licensing justices for the Wandsworth division of the county of London to show cause why a certiorari should not issue to remove into the Queen's Bench Division the licence or certificate granted for 2, Abercrombie Street that it might be quashed, and the court ordered a rule nisi to issue accordingly, on the ground that the application in respect of 2, Abercrombie Street, was for the removal of a licence within the meaning of s. 50 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and was in substance and effect a removal order, and as such, and as being made in spite of the owners of the premises, beyond the jurisdiction of the justices and contrary to s. 50 of the Act, and this rule was made absolute.

By s. 50 of the Licensing Act, 1872 [now s. 25 of the Licensing Act, 1953] :

“Licences may be removed from one part of a licensing district to another part of the same district, or from one licensing district to another licensing district within the same county, in manner following :

The application for an order sanctioning removal shall be made by the person desiring to be the holder of the licence when removed, and shall be made at a general annual licensing meeting, or any adjournment thereof, to the justices authorised to grant new licences in the licensing district in which the premises are situated to which the licence is to be removed.

Notice of the intended application shall be given in the same manner as notice is given of an application for the grant of a new licence.

A copy of the notice shall be personally served upon or sent by registered letter to the owner of the premises from which the licence is to be removed, and the holder of the licence, unless he is also the applicant.

The justices to whom the application is made shall not make an order sanctioning such removal unless they are satisfied that no objection to such removal is made by the owner of the premises to which the licence is attached, or by the holder of the licence, or by any other person whom such justices shall determine to have a right to object to the removal.

Subject as aforesaid, such justices shall have the same power to make an order sanctioning such removal as they have to grant new licences; but no such order shall be valid unless confirmed by the confirming authority of the licensing district.”

THE EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C.—I am glad, out of respect to the two courts below, from whom this question has come, that the matter has been so elaborately and carefully argued; but I confess for myself that I cannot, now that the matter is fully before me, entertain any doubt as to the conclusion at which your Lordships ought to arrive. I admit that during a considerable part of the argument, before my mind was sufficiently alive to the provisions of the Licensing Act, 1872, I was very much impressed by the argument which seems to have found favour with the courts below, because the transaction looked to me, having regard to s. 50 as being, what I think two of the learned judges say it was, doing by an indirect performance that which the legislature had prohibited—namely, the removal of a licence from a house occupied by a tenant, against the will of his landlord to some other house where he could carry on his business at the sacrifice of the landlord's interest in the former house.

Without such a careful examination of the Act of Parliament as we have now had, that would be the first impression of a person reading these sections: it might be considered that the legislature had provided for the interest of the landlord by making the landlord's dissent an absolute bar to the proceeding by the magistrates by way of removal. Upon a careful examination, however, of the statutes it appears to me that s. 50, upon which reliance is placed, is a section which, whatever may have been its original design, has under the statute no machinery and no provision which can effectually prevent the grant of new licences, and I do not believe that the legislature ever contemplated that such a bar should be placed in the way of the jurisdiction and discretion of the magistrates as would be involved in permitting the mere refusal of the owner of the house, as distinguished from the tenant of the house, to prevent the magistrates exercising their discretion in the matter. I can well understand that, given a current licence and given some proceeding whereby the current licence should be removed to other premises, the legislature would have prevented the tenant sacrificing his landlord's interest by a proceeding in which the landlord himself was not represented. That is, on the one hand, clear enough. When I find that the only application for a removal must be made at the general licensing sessions, and when I observe, what has been so often pointed out to us, the interval between that date, Mar. 5, and April 5, when the new licence must begin, I confess that I am wholly unable to see what useful object can be performed by that section, or what protection to anybody is thereby given.

As regards renewals and new licences it is obvious that neither this court nor any other court can supply machinery or provisions which the statute itself has not enacted. If the legislature intended that there should be some protection during the currency of the licence, and intended that the landlord should be represented, all one can say is that no such provisions can be found in the statute, and your Lordships have no jurisdiction to supply them. What is clear is that by this Act of Parliament, and by the others to which the learned counsel have called our attention from time to time, what the legislature has ultimately done has been to give an absolute unfettered discretion to the magistrates. Certainly it would be a very singular result of that legislation if, upon a new licence being applied for, the magistrates being invested, as by the hypothesis they are, with an absolutely unlimited discretion, the mere veto of the person who owns the house held by a licensed person, which licensed person was applying for a licence for another house, should prevent the magistrates granting a perfectly new licence to a new house, and that that bar should exist because the applicant had before that held another house under another licence. That would be a very singular result indeed, and certainly, unless there was something very clear in the statute to compel me to come to such a conclusion, I should absolutely refuse to assume that the legislature had done so. But it is not necessary for your Lordships to consider that, because the question here is whether or not anything has been done which the justices were not at perfect liberty to do. It must be made out before any such order could be made and maintained as has been made by both the courts below that the magistrates acted without jurisdiction.

I quite follow what counsel for the respondents have so ingeniously and earnestly pointed out, that the result arrived at may be the same as would have been arrived at by a "removal." Granted; but what then? The thing that the magistrates have done is not the thing which is contemplated by s. 50—that is to say, not the same as regards the actual order. Whether it is the same thing in substance or not I will treat of in a moment, but it is not the thing. What they have done is, they have licensed a house, and that licence does not purport to be, and is not certainly upon the face of the instrument, the former licence which existed of the Five Ales, but it is an absolutely new licence. What the legislature meant by the "removal of the licence" I can only conjecture, but I should think it would mean that a licence which had existed in one house should be, as indeed the phrase implies (it is not a very happy one), removed to another house. If any order was asked for upon that subject, it is to be remembered that whatever discretion the magistrates have they are limited in the orders they make by the language of the statute, and if they wanted to make such an order as that they must make the order accordingly. It is all very well to say that it may come to the same thing; but where the magistrates are fettered by a statute which enables them only to act in a particular way, they must abide by that way. Here the magistrates on the affidavit laid before us say they were not asked to make an order for removal and did not suppose they were making an order for removal; and when we look at the document itself there is no such thing as an order for removal to be found in the whole course of the proceedings; and yet your Lordships are asked to say that these proceedings are without jurisdiction, because, although everything that the magistrates did and everything that they intended to do was within their jurisdiction, it is said that the effect produced is just the same as if they had made some other order which they never did make and never intended to make; and by this circuitous process of reasoning it is to be supposed that the magistrates acted outside of their jurisdiction.

The observation immediately arises that where you are dealing with a subject-matter of this sort the form is part of the substance. It is a delusion to suppose that magistrates may do what may be equivalent to this, that, or the other. They are within the iron framework of a statute, and they have no jurisdiction to go beyond it. All that they did do, and all that they intended to do, was that they licensed a person to occupy a new house for the purposes contemplated by the statute.

I decline to go into the question whether or not, if there was anything erroneous in the order which the magistrates made, the proper form of remedying that error has been adopted. I confess that I should require further argument before I hastily came to the conclusion that this was the proper form, but I decline to enter into the question or give any opinion upon the subject. If the question hereafter arises whether certiorari is the proper remedy or not, then will be the proper time to decide it; but inasmuch as upon any hypothesis it can only be by some error in the proceedings, and inasmuch as I am of opinion that there is no error here at all, but that the magistrates have proceeded strictly within their jurisdiction, I am of opinion that this order of the Court of Appeal, confirming the order of the court below, ought to be reversed, and I accordingly so move your Lordships.

LORD WATSON.—The legislature have enacted that the licensing justices shall not remove (whatever that may mean) a licence from one house to another unless the owner of the house which is about to be deprived of the licence is called as a party to the proceedings for his interest, and unless he consents to the order being pronounced. In the present case I think that the only question is whether such an order has been pronounced. I do not think it enough to bring the case within the statutory requirement of the presence of the owner of the house that the proceedings of the justices shall be attended with precisely the same consequences as if they had been asked to make, and had in point of fact made, an order of removal. It is not enough to say, as some of the judges have said, that the two things are in substance the same. It is not enough to say that either directly or indirectly the result must be the same.

The court must come to the conclusion, in order to bring the matter within the statutory prohibition, that what has been done is one of the things which the legislature have prohibited. I need not repeat what has been already said by the Lord Chancellor, but in the present case it appears to me that in construing, as one must do, that clause which is not easy of construction, s. 50 of the Licensing Act, 1872, an order of removal never was contemplated by any of the parties to this case. It was not applied for; it was not intended to be granted by the licensing justices; and when one examines what they have done it amounts to the case of the destruction (at least it was said to amount to destruction) of one licence and the continuance of another. That is, to my mind, entirely opposed to what is the plain meaning of the statute in using the word "removal" which means that a licence shall be transplanted from one house and serve as a privilege and protection to another house—it may be to another house in a different licensing district. In those circumstances I do not think that the respondents in this case were entitled to any remedy.

I do not think that they have shown facts requiring any remedy, and therefore I think it quite unnecessary to discuss in what form the remedy ought to have been granted if it had been required. A

LORD MORRIS.—I am of the same opinion. In this case an application is made for a certiorari on the part of the respondents to remove into the Queen's Bench Division an order for a licence of 2, Abercrombie Street in order to have it quashed. That licence on the face of it is a perfectly valid licence, because it is a licence granted by persons competent and having jurisdiction—it is a licence to carry on in the house 2, Abercrombie Street, the business of sales for consumption off the premises. Then, what is the objection to that licence which is good upon the face of it? It is said that although it is a licence on the face of it as a grant for a new licence, yet it amounts to an order for a removal. Sometimes it is said “in substance,” sometimes it is said “in effect,” and sometimes it is said “the consequences are the same,” but the argument is that it amounts to an order for a removal under s. 50 of the Licensing Act. As I have said, on the face of it it does not purport to be anything of the sort; it purports to be what it is—a grant of a new licence. The Act of 1872 contemplates licences being obtained and granted under three sets of circumstances. By s. 40 [repealed] it contemplates the grant of renewals; by s. 42 [repealed] it contemplates the grant of new licences; and by s. 50 it contemplates the grant of a “removal” of a licence, which I should understand from the use of the words “removal of the licence” to refer to a licence then in esse. In this case the proceedings have not been taken merely under s. 50. B

The applicant never applied for a removal—he applied for a renewal—he applied for the grant of a new licence to the entire of 2, Abercrombie Street. Why is he to be held as having applied for a grant of a “removal” when he did not do it? As a matter of fact, he did not take the proceedings for that. There are three different applications dealt with by the statute. There are three different sets of notices to be given by the statute; there are three different results to be arrived at by the statute. The first is renewal, the second is a grant of a new licence, and the third is an order for removal. Why is it to be persevered in that he must be held to have applied for that which he did not apply for? Why is it to be held as against the magistrates that they made an order, which they did not make, for a removal under s. 50, because, forsooth, the consequences may be practically the same as if that proceeding had been taken? That is a matter for legislation. This House, as one branch only of the legislature, is not entitled to legislate. If it is suggested that this protection to brewers and their houses should be extended to the case of renewals, and to the case of a grant of new licences, it is for the legislature to say so. The legislature have confined the protection to the case of removal. Suffice it to say that this is not a case of removal. If it were not for the very great respect which I have for the courts that have decided the opposite, I should have said that it was a very plain case indeed. C

A solicitor was the sole executor and trustee of a will which, after directing payment of debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, directed that he should be the solicitor to the estate and as such should be allowed all professional charges notwithstanding his executorship. The estate was insolvent. The solicitor having defended in person a creditors' action,

Held: he was not entitled to his profit costs since the power in the will to charge for them was equivalent to a legacy and could not, therefore, take effect as against the creditors.

Per CHITTY, L.J.: This principle applied to all professional trustees.

Appeal from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., in an action brought by creditors against S. Franklin, a solicitor, the sole executor and trustee of the will of Walter White, deceased, in which a summons was taken out by the plaintiffs asking for an order that as the testator's real and personal estate was insufficient to pay his debts in full, the defendant was not entitled to any profit costs under the direction contained in the testator's will.

After directing payment of debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, the will directed that the defendant should be the solicitor to the estate, and as such, notwithstanding his acceptance of the trusteeship and executorship of the will, should be allowed all professional and other charges for his time and trouble, which, if employed as solicitor to the trustees and executors, not being himself a trustee and executor, he would be entitled to make.

The estate was insolvent. The two other trustees and executors appointed by the will having renounced probate and disclaimed the trusts of the will, the will was proved by the defendant alone, who appeared and defended the action in person, acting as solicitor for himself.

The summons was adjourned into court, and came on to be heard before KEKEWICH, J., on the further consideration of the action, who decided (77 L.T. 793) that the defendant was not entitled to his profit costs, as the power to charge was equivalent to a legacy, which could not take effect as against the creditors. From that decision the defendant now appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and J. G. Wood for the defendant.

Farwell, Q.C., and Church for the plaintiffs, were not called on to argue.

SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R.—I do not think that it is possible for us to differ judicially from the decision of the learned judge in the court below. This is a creditors' action. The defendant is a trustee who happens to be a solicitor, and happens also to be the only trustee and only executor of the testator. The other executors and trustees have disclaimed and must, therefore, be disregarded. It is impossible to get over the authorities, and the principles on which they are based. ~~The estate is insolvent, and the solicitor-trustee is seeking to charge profit costs.~~ KEKEWICH, J., has declared in the order appealed from that the defendant is not entitled to any profit costs out of the estate, under the directions in the testator's will, in competition with the creditors. The estate being insolvent, I do not see how to get over that declaration, having regard to the decisions. It is no doubt hard upon the solicitor, but it cannot be helped. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I see no escape from the proposition of law as laid down by KEKEWICH, J. The law is that a trustee must give his services gratuitously in the absence of a direction to the contrary. This direction is bounty. No one can claim the bounty of a testator until the creditors are satisfied. The principle applies not only to a solicitor-trustee, but equally to all trustees—to accountant-trustees, to architect-trustees, and surveyor-trustees; in fact, to all professional trustees.

HENN COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Re PERKINS. POYSER v. BEYFUS

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Nathaniel Lindley, M.R., Rigby and Henn Collins, L.JJ.), May 24, 25, 26, June 11, 1898]

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Assignment—Successive assignments—Covenants to pay rent and indemnify assignors—Bankruptcy of first assignee—Lessee granted bankrupt assignee's right to indemnity in consideration of release of bankrupt's estate from liability under bankrupt's covenant with lessee—Right of lessee to prove in bankrupt's estate for future liability—Bankrupt's right to indemnity against succeeding assignee—"Property" of bankrupt—Construction of release of bankrupt's estate—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict., c. 52), ss. 20, 40, 50 (5), 56, 57, 168.

The plaintiff was the original lessee under a lease containing covenants by him to pay rent, to insure the demised property, and to perform the covenants in the lease. He assigned the lease to Plaistowe who assigned it to Perkins, each of the assignees covenanting with his assignor to perform the covenants in the lease and to indemnify the assignor against breaches of covenant. The plaintiff having been called on to pay, and having in fact paid, arrears of rent due under the lease, tendered a proof against Plaistowe's estate in bankruptcy for the rent he had paid and for his estimated future liability under the covenants in the lease. A compromise was agreed to between the plaintiff and Plaistowe's trustee in bankruptcy which was embodied in a deed whereby, in consideration of the plaintiff withdrawing his proof and releasing Plaistowe's estate from all liability in respect of Plaistowe's covenant with the plaintiff, Plaistowe's trustee assigned to the plaintiff the benefit of Perkins' covenant with Plaistowe, together with the right to recover from Perkins' estate all such damages as Plaistowe might have recovered but for his bankruptcy. Under this deed the plaintiff carried in a claim against the estate of Perkins, who had died nearly two years previously, for payment of the rent already paid by him and an indemnity against future liability for breaches of covenant. The plaintiff succeeded in his claim and Perkins' executors appealed against that decision.

Held: (i) under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Plaistowe's trustee was entitled to compromise the plaintiff's claim by assigning to him the benefit of Perkins' covenant because (a) by ss. 20, 44, 50 (5) and 168 of the Act of 1883 the plaintiff was entitled to prove in Plaistowe's estate not only for the rent already paid by him, but also in respect of Plaistowe's future liability under his covenant with the plaintiff: Hardy v. Fothergill (1) (1888), 13 App. Cas. 351, applied; and (b) the right of Plaistowe's trustee to sue Perkins' estate on Perkins' covenant with Plaistowe was "property" within the meaning of s. 168 of the Act of 1883 and was, therefore, assignable to the plaintiff: Secar v. Lawson (2) (1880), 15 Ch.D. 426, applied; and the damages recoverable by Plaistowe's trustee against Perkins' estate would not be confined to the amount of the dividend payable to the plaintiff in respect of his proof against Plaistowe's estate: Cruse v. Paine (3) (1868), L.R. 6 Eq. 641, applied; (ii) although the release in the deed was couched in general terms it must, if possible, be construed so as not to defeat the purpose of the deed; accordingly, the release did not extend to all Plaistowe's estate including the asset assigned to the plaintiff, but excluded that asset, and the release did not, therefore, have the effect of discharging Plaistowe's estate from all liability under his covenant with the plaintiff and thus of discharging Perkins' estate from liability to Plaistowe; under the deed the plaintiff had acquired the right to sue Perkins' estate; and, therefore, the appeal failed.

Appeal against an order of NORTH, J., on an originating summons taken out by one Poyser, for a declaration that the estate of one Perkins, deceased, was indebted to the plaintiff for a sum paid by him as rent under a covenant in a lease and was liable to indemnify the plaintiff for subsequent payments of rent and against future breaches of the covenants in the lease. The lease had been assigned to Perkins. NORTH, J., allowed the plaintiff's claim for the declaration, and the executors of Perkins' estate now appealed against that decision.

June 11, 1898. SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R., read the following judgment of the court.—By a lease, dated Oct. 5, 1891, a certain house was leased to the plaintiff for a term still unexpired, and by this lease the plaintiff covenanted to pay rent and to insure the house and perform certain other obligations usual in leases. On May 8, 1893, Poyser, the plaintiff, assigned this lease to Plaistowe, and, on April 1, 1895, Plaistowe assigned it to Perkins. Each of these assignments contained a covenant by the assignee with his assignor to pay the rent and perform the covenants reserved and contained in the lease of Oct. 5, 1891, and also to keep him, the assignor, indemnified against the same. In December, 1895, Perkins died. On June 12, 1897, Plaistowe was adjudicated bankrupt, and Berry was appointed his trustee. The plaintiff Poyser was called on to pay, and he did pay, the arrears of rent, which became due under the lease of Oct. 5, 1891, and he tendered a proof against Plaistowe's estate for £1,353, the amount paid by the plaintiff and the estimated amount of his liability under his covenants contained in such lease. Thereupon a compromise was agreed to between the plaintiff and the trustee in bankruptcy, and was carried out by a deed of Aug. 31, 1897, which has given rise to the present controversy.

This deed was made between the trustee, of the one part, and the plaintiff, of the other part. It recited the facts above stated, and then proceeded as follows :

"Whereas the said Oscar Berry has, with the permission of the said committee of inspection, testified by a resolution passed at a meeting of the said committee of inspection held the 31st day of August, 1897, at 8, Southwark Street, Borough, in the county of Surrey, and by way of compromise of the claim of the said E. J. Poyser against the estate of the said bankrupt, agreed to sell and dispose of to the said E. J. Poyser the full benefit of the said covenant on the part of the said G. F. Perkins, with the rights and powers hereinafter assigned, in consideration of the said E. J. Poyser paying to him the sum of £5, and executing such release as is hereinafter contained. Now this indenture witnesseth that, in pursuance of the said agreement and in consideration of the sum of £5 now paid by the said E. J. Poyser to the said Oscar Berry (the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged), and of the release hereinafter contained, the said O. Berry, as trustee, and with the permission testified as aforesaid of the said committee of inspection, doth hereby assign unto the said E. J. Poyser the full benefit of the covenants by the said G. F. Perkins with the said F. M. E. Plaistowe contained in the hereinbefore recited indenture of April 1, 1895, as aforesaid, with the right to recover and receive from the said G. F. Perkins, his heirs, executors, or administrators, estate or effects, and to retain for the benefit of the said E. J. Poyser, his executors, administrators, and assigns, all and every such damages, costs, or other sums of money, if any, and to enforce for the like benefit all such other relief by way of indemnity or otherwise as the said F. M. E. Plaistowe, his executors, or administrators, but for his bankruptcy, or the said O. Berry or other the trustee for the time being in the bankruptcy might have been entitled now, or at any time or times hereafter, to recover or to enforce for the benefit of the said F. M. E. Plaistowe or his estate for any breach or breaches committed or hereafter to be committed of the said covenants or any of them or otherwise under or in respect of the liability of the said G. F. Perkins or his estate by virtue of such covenants or any of them if these presents and the arrangement hereby entered into had not been executed or made, and the right to bring, prosecute, carry on, compound, or release any action or proceeding for any such purpose, and all other rights, powers, privileges, and authorities which the said O. Berry, as such trustee, with such permission as aforesaid, can lawfully transfer to the said E. J. Poyser in connection with the premises to hold the premises unto the said E. J. Poyser, his executors, administrators, and assigns for his and their own benefit absolutely. And this indenture further witnesseth that, in further pursuance of the said agreement and in consideration of the assignment hereinbefore contained, the said E. J. Poyser hereby withdraws the said proof for the sum of £1,353 0s. 4d., and releases and discharges the estate of the said bankrupt and the said O. Berry as such trustee as aforesaid from all claims and demands under or in respect of the covenants by the said F. M. E. Plaistowe with the said E. J. Poyser contained in the hereinbefore recited indenture of May 8, 1893, as aforesaid."

Under this deed the plaintiff carried in a claim against Perkins's estate for payment out of his assets of what the plaintiff had paid for rent and insurance and for future indemnity against liability under the covenants contained in the lease of Oct. 5,

1891. It appeared that shortly after Plaistowe's bankruptcy Perkins's executors assigned the lease to a person named Jay, who, however, did not pay the rent or perform the covenants, so as to relieve Perkins's estate from liability to Plaistowe, or, rather, to his trustee in bankruptcy. The defendants are Perkins's executors, and they admit assets. NORTH, J., made an order allowing the plaintiff's claim, and from this order Perkins's executors appealed. A

The appeal raises two questions—viz., (i) whether the rights vested by the Bankruptcy Act in Plaistowe's trustee could be assigned by him to the plaintiff; and (ii) whether, having regard to the terms of the deed and the release of Plaistowe's estate, the plaintiff acquired any right to sue Perkins's executors. The first of these questions turns on the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The material sections are ss. 20, 44, 50 (cl. 5), 56, 57, and 168, which defines "property." It is plain from ss. 20, 44, 50 (cl. 5), and 168, and from the decision in Hardy v. Fothergill (1) that the plaintiff Poyser had a right of proof against Plaistowe's estate not only for the sums paid by the plaintiff for rent and fire insurance but also in respect of Plaistowe's future liability under his own covenants with the plaintiff. It is also plain from ss. 56 and 57 that it was competent for the trustee in bankruptcy to compromise the claim made by the plaintiff and to assign to the plaintiff any assignable asset vested in the trustee upon the terms that the plaintiff should accept such asset in satisfaction of all demands against Plaistowe's remaining assets. It is also plain that the right of the trustee to sue Perkins's executors upon Perkins's covenant was an asset—i.e., was property within the meaning of s. 168, and was assignable to the plaintiff or to anyone else (see s. 56 and Scear v. Lawson (2)), and that the damages in an action by the trustee against Perkins's executors would not be confined to the dividend payable to the plaintiff in respect of his proof against Plaistowe's estate: see Cruse v. Paine (3). This disposes of the first ground of appeal. B C D E

The second turns on the true effect of the release contained in the deed of August, 1897. If this release is to be construed as a release by the plaintiff of Plaistowe or of his estate from all liability under his covenants with the plaintiff, then the effect will be to discharge Perkins's estate from all liability under his covenant to indemnify Plaistowe. A liability to indemnify against a liability which has no existence, and which can never arise, is a contradiction in terms. A distinction was attempted to be drawn between the covenant by Perkins to pay the rent and perform the covenant to insure on the one hand, and his covenant to indemnify Plaistowe on the other, and it was contended that, although the release might extinguish all liability on the covenant to indemnify, it did not affect the covenant to pay the rent and to insure. Much time was spent in discussing these points, and in examining such cases as Saward v. Anstey (4), Carr v. Roberts (5), and Ashdown v. Ingamells (6), and in considering the amount of damages which could be recovered if the distinction suggested could be drawn, and had in fact to be made. But, in the view we take of the true construction of the deed of Aug. 31, 1897, these questions do not arise. The release contained in the deed, although couched in very general terms, must, if possible, be so construed as not to defeat the object or purpose of the deed of which it forms part. The recitals and first witnessing part show that the release cannot be rationally construed as extending to all Plaistowe's estate, including the asset assigned to the plaintiff. The estate released must exclude that asset. Again, the claims and demands from which Plaistowe's estate is released cannot be rationally construed as all claims and demands in respect of Plaistowe's covenants. The claims and demands released must be confined to those against the released assets, and cannot be rationally held to include those the preservation of which is essential to the recovery by the plaintiff of the asset assigned to him and which asset he is to take in satisfaction of all demands. F G H I

In so construing the release the court is not departing from well-settled principles applicable to the construction of such documents. General words of release are always controlled by recitals and context which show that, unless the general words are restricted, the object and purpose of the document in which they occur must necessarily be frustrated. General words are always construed so as to give effect to, and not so as to destroy, the expressed intentions of those who use them. Good illustrations of this principle will be found in Payler v. Homersham (7) and Lindo v. Lindo (8). In our opinion, therefore, the appeal fails on this ground also. It is to be observed that NORTH, J., has merely given the plaintiff liberty to apply in respect of future breaches of covenant. He has not impounded assets to meet them, nor attempted to estimate damages in respect of them. The order is right both in substance and in form, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

WILLIAMS v. BIRMINGHAM BATTERY AND METAL CO.

July 6, 1899]

Master and Servant—Duty of master—Provision of safe plant—Dangerous employment—Liability of master—Acceptance by servant of risk and absence of proper precautions.

A workman employed upon a tramway raised at some height from the ground was accidentally killed while attempting to descend from it. The jury found that the workman's masters were negligent in not providing a ladder without which it was dangerous to descend from the tramway. The jury also found that the workman knew that it was dangerous to descend without a ladder. In an action brought under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, by the widow of the deceased workman,

Held: as the jury had not found that the deceased had taken upon himself the risk of working on the tramway in the absence of ladders or other safe means of ascent and descent the widow was entitled to judgment.

Per ROMER, L.J.: If the employment is of a dangerous nature, a duty lies on the employer to use all reasonable precautions for the protection of the servant. If by reason of breach of that duty a servant suffers injury, the employer is prima facie liable. And it is no sufficient answer to the prima facie liability for the employer to show merely that the servant was aware of the risk and of the non-existence of the precautions which should have been taken by the employer and which, if taken, would or might have prevented the injury. In order to escape liability the employer must establish that the servant has taken upon himself the risk without the precautions. Whether a servant has taken that upon himself is a question of fact to be decided on the circumstances of each case. In considering such a question the circumstance that the servant has entered into, or continued, his employment with knowledge of the risk and of the absence of precautions is important, but not necessarily conclusive against him.

Appeal from a decision of DARLING, J., upon the findings of the jury at the trial of the action. G

The action was brought under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, by the widow of a workman named Jacob Williams, who at the time of the accident which caused his death was in the service of the defendants, who carried on business as copper refiners. The defendants' refinery was connected with an adjoining canal by means of a tramway which, at the canal end, was raised about 11ft. above the level of the ground. In trying to get down to the ground from the tramway the deceased workman fell, and was killed. H

The plaintiff alleged that the death of the deceased was caused by the defendants' personal negligence in not providing proper means and appliances for workmen to descend from the tramway. The defendants pleaded that the alleged defect and want of a ladder was known to the deceased, and that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence. I

At the trial of the action before DARLING, J., with a jury the learned judge left the following questions to the jury: (i) Did the defendants exercise due care to have the tramway in a safe and proper condition, so as to protect their servants working upon it against unnecessary risks? Answer: No. (ii) Was it dangerous to descend from the tramway without the means of a ladder? Answer: Yes. (iii) Had the deceased the same means of knowing that this was dangerous as the defendants had? Answer: Yes. (iv) Did the deceased know that it was dangerous? Answer:

A Yes. (v) Was the deceased guilty of contributory negligence? Answer: No. The jury also assessed the damages at £130. Upon these findings DARLING, J., gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

B July 6, 1899. The following judgments were read.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an action at common law for damages brought by the widow of a deceased workman, by the aid of Lord Campbell's Act, against the masters of the deceased man for having been guilty of negligence whereby the workman lost his life. The first two questions left to the jury by the learned judge were:—Did the defendants exercise due care to have the tramway in a safe and proper condition so as to protect their servants working upon it against unnecessary risks? And the answer was, No. Secondly, Was it dangerous to descend from the tramway without the means of a ladder? Answer, Yes. I will deal with the other questions left to the jury hereafter. This case was remarkably well argued before us by the learned juniors on each side, and I believe almost every case bearing upon the liability of a master for injuries to his servant in the course of his employment and the applicability thereto of the maxim volenti non fit injuria was brought out in review before us; but when the case is rightly apprehended the judgment may be comparatively short.

E In the first place, there can be no doubt as to the duty of a master to his man, and I will take a passage upon this subject from LORD HERSCHELL's judgment in Smith v. Baker & Sons (1) in the House of Lords. The noble Lord says ([1891] A.C. at p. 362):

F "It is quite clear that the contract between employer and employed involves on the part of the former the duty of taking reasonable care to provide proper appliances, and to maintain them in a proper condition, and so to carry on his operations as not to subject those employed by him to unnecessary risk."

G This being the master's duty towards his man, if the master knowingly does not perform it, it follows that he is guilty of negligence towards the man; and the first two findings of the jury in this case show that the defendants had not performed this duty, and had therefore been guilty of negligence towards the deceased, and it is not disputed that it was by reason of the absence of the ladder, caused by this neglect of duty, that the deceased man met with his death. In my opinion there was ample evidence to support the above findings, for it was proved that the absence of the ladder, which was the cause of the accident, had been well known to the defendants, and that they neglected to provide it, and hence the occasion of the man's death. This is not the case where a master has provided proper appliances and done his best to maintain them in a state of efficiency, in which case the man has no action against his master if the appliances became unsafe whereby the man has been injured unless he avers and proves that the master knew of their having become unsafe, and that the man was ignorant of it: Griffiths v. London and St. Katharine Docks (2). When proper appliances have been supplied by a master I to a man they may well become unsafe to the knowledge of the man and without the knowledge of the master, and so it is that each issue must in such a case be established by the man when he sues his master. This is the case of no proper appliances having been supplied by the master at all, so that the man might carry on his operation in such a way as not to be exposed to unnecessary risk. The case is similar to that of Mellors v. Shaw (3).

If this case had stopped here it appears to me clear that there must have been judgment for the plaintiff, she having proved personal negligence in the defendants whereby the deceased man met with his death: and how do the defendants seek to get rid of this case so far successfully made and proved against them? They plead A in their defence that "the alleged defect and want," i.e., of a ladder, was known to the deceased, and also that he was guilty of contributory negligence. As regards this last defence, the jury have negatived it. But what as to the defence set up that "the defect and want (of the ladder) was known to the deceased"? What defence is that to the proved personal negligence of the masters? The defendants B have advisedly abstained from raising the defence of the deceased man having contracted, or consented, or undertaken to run the risk of the defect, i.e., the want of the ladder, so as to raise the defence summarised by the maxim, volenti non fit injuria. That the mere knowledge of the risk does not necessarily involve consent to undertake the risk has now beyond question been settled by the House of Lords :

 see the judgments in Smith v. Baker & Sons (1), and specially the judgment of C LORD HALSBURY, citing with approval BOWEN and LINDLEY, L.JJ. The sole question which was asked of the jury as to this was, Had the deceased the same means of knowing that this was dangerous as the defendants had? Answer, Yes. Did the deceased know it was dangerous? Answer, Yes. How does this prove that he either contracted, or consented, or undertook to accept the risk? The defendants called no evidence. They did not even attempt to show what was the contract under D which the deceased man served. Nor did they ask that any question as to whether the man had contracted to take the risk should be left to the jury. As LORD WATSON said, in Smith v. Baker & Sons (1) ([1891] A.C. at p. 355) :

"When, as is commonly the case, his acceptance or non-acceptance of the risk is left to implication, the workman cannot reasonably be held to have under- E taken it unless he knew of its existence, and appreciated or had the means of appreciating its danger. But assuming that he did so, I am unable to accede to the suggestion that the mere fact of his continuing at his work, with such knowledge and appreciation, will in every case necessarily imply his acceptance.
 Whether it will have that effect or not depends, in my opinion, to a considerable extent upon the nature of the risk, and the workman's connection with it, as well as upon other considerations, which must vary according to the circum- F stances of each case."

If the defence of volenti non fit injuria was to be insisted upon, which the defendants did not raise in their pleadings, nor at the trial, they must have obtained a finding of the jury upon it in their favour. They have not done so, and for the reasons above I think that the judgment entered by the learned judge for the G defendant must be set aside, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for the £130 damages assessed by the jury in favour of the plaintiff, with costs here and below.
 My brother VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agrees with this judgment.

ROMER, L.J.—Many authorities bearing on the question we have to decide have been cited and discussed. I do not propose to review them. They appear to me H to establish the following propositions as to the liability at common law of an employer of labour. If the employment is of a dangerous nature, a duty lies on the employer to use all reasonable precautions for the protection of the servant.
 If by reason of breach of that duty a servant suffers injury, the employer is prima facie liable. And it is no sufficient answer to the prima facie liability for the employer to show merely that the servant was aware of the risk and of the non- I existence of the precautions which should have been taken by the employer and which, if taken, would or might have prevented the injury. In order to escape liability the employer must establish that the servant has taken upon himself the risk without the precautions. Whether the servant has taken that upon himself is a question of fact to be decided on the circumstances of each case. In considering such a question the circumstance that the servant has entered into, or continued, his employment with knowledge of the risk and of the absence of precautions is important, but not necessarily conclusive against him.

I will now apply the above propositions to the case before us. The tramway, as left by the defendants without ladders or other safe means for ascending to or descending from it, was clearly dangerous. The defendants, in not providing these ladders or other safe means, were, in my opinion, guilty of breach of duty to the workmen employed about the tramway. This is in substance what the jury have found by their answers to the two first questions left to them by the judge. That the workman Williams was injured by reason of the absence of the precautions above mentioned, which should have been taken by the defendants, is clear. For that injury, then, the defendants are prima facie liable.

The question then is, Have the defendants established a case to free themselves from the prima facie liability? The only findings of the jury favourable to the defendants are that Williams had the same means of knowing the danger as the defendants and did know the danger. Those two findings are not sufficient to free the defendants from liability unless they amount to a finding that Williams took upon himself the risk of working on the tramway in the absence of the ladders or other safe means of ascending and descending. It appears to me that such a conclusion cannot be drawn from these two findings of the jury. This being so, on the findings of the jury as a whole there should be judgment for the plaintiff. No doubt there was evidence before the jury on which the defendants, if they had taken the point, might have asked the jury to hold that Williams had taken upon himself the risk. But no such finding was asked for by the defendants, and indeed I cannot see that the point as to Williams having taken the risk upon himself was at all taken by the defendants prior to this appeal, I presume because they thought it hopeless to expect to succeed on the point. At any rate they cannot now ask us to decide, as a matter of fact, that Williams had taken upon himself the risk, or call upon us to act as if a finding to that effect had been obtained from the jury. It appears to me, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for the ascertained amount of damage, with costs here and below.

By s. 47 of the Aire and Calder Navigation Act, 1889 (which incorporated the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847), it was provided that if any vessel should be sunk in any part of the navigation of the river Ouse, and the owner, or person in charge, should not remove it "the undertakers may if they think fit, recover such expenses from the owner of such vessel in a court of summary jurisdiction."

Held: (i) an action by undertakers to recover expenses under this section could not be maintained in the High Court since there was no liability to pay the expenses at common law and the only right to recover the expenses was under the section which provided that courts of summary jurisdiction should have exclusive jurisdiction in the matter; (ii) it would be unsound in principle to grant a declaration as to the right to recover expenses since the matter as to which a declaration was sought was exclusively submitted to the jurisdiction of the summary court.

Per LORD HERSCHELL: The words "the owner" in s. 47 do not mean the person who was the owner of the vessel at the time she sank, if he had ceased to be the owner before the expenses were incurred. The words refer to the person who was the owner at the time the expenses were incurred.

Appeal by the plaintiffs in the action from an order of the Court of Appeal, 74 L.T. 86, affirming a decision of MATHEW, J., in favour of the defendants.

The appellant, as the secretary and public officer of the undertakers of the navigation of the rivers Aire and Calder, brought an action in the High Court against the respondents, who were formerly the owners of the steamship J. M. Lennard, which sank in the river Ouse, which was within the undertakers' district, to recover the sum of £3,278, expended by them in unsuccessfully attempting to raise and finally in blowing up that vessel to free the navigation of the river, which was impeded by the wreck. The respondents denied their liability on the ground that before the undertakers had incurred any expense in the matter they had abandoned the vessel, and had given notice of abandonment to their underwriters.

Sir W. Phillimore and Montague Lush for the appellant.
J. Walton, Q.C., and A. Lennard for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

July 19, 1897. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL.—On the night of Aug. 20, 1894, the J. M. Lennard, of which the respondents were then the owners, sank in the river Ouse, within the navigation district of the undertakers of the river Aire and Calder. The respondents abandoned the vessel, and on Aug. 24 gave notice of abandonment to their underwriters. The underwriters endeavoured to raise the vessel, but finding it impracticable to do so, they, on Aug. 31, gave to the Aire and Calder Navigation "notice of abandonment." On Sept. 5 the underwriters settled with the respondents for a total loss. On Sept. 6 the Aire and Calder Navigation entered into an agreement with the East Coast Salvage Co. Under this contract an attempt was made to raise the vessel, but it was unsuccessful; the expenses incurred amounted to £2,778. The undertakers of the navigation then proceeded to destroy the vessel by means of explosives, at a cost of £500. The present action was brought to recover these two sums. The defendants, by their defence and counterclaim, alleged that the stranding and damages consequent thereon were occasioned by the plaintiff's negligence. The facts, except as regards these allegations of negligence, being admitted, it was ordered by MATHEW, J., on a summons for directions, that the point of law as to the right of the plaintiffs to maintain the action should be argued on a day named. The order did not specify what the point of law referred to was, but it seems to have been, practically speaking, confined to the question what was the true construction of s. 47 of the Aire and Calder Navigation Act. After hearing argument, MATHEW, J., ordered judgment to be entered for the defendants with costs, and this judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

Section 47 of the Act referred to (so far as is material to the present case) provides that if any vessel shall be sunk in the river Ouse within the limits of improvement defined by the Act of 1884, and the owner or person in charge shall not forthwith remove the same, it shall be lawful for the undertakers to remove the vessel, and keep the same with her tackle and loading until payment be made of all the expenses relating thereto; or to sell such vessel, tackle, and loading, and thereout to pay such expenses and the expenses of the sale, returning to the owner of such vessel the overplus, if any, on demand; or that "the undertakers may, if they think fit, recover such expenses from the owner of such vessel in a court of summary jurisdiction."

At an early stage in the argument of the appeal the question was raised whether the High Court had any jurisdiction to entertain a claim for the recovery of expenses under the enactment I have just quoted, or to adjudicate upon it except by way of appeal from a court of summary jurisdiction. Unwilling as I am to determine the appeal otherwise than on the merits of the case, I feel bound to hold that it was not competent for the appellant to recover the expenses, even if the respondents were liable for them, by action in the High Court. The respondents were under no liability to pay these expenses at common law. The liability, if it exists, is created by the enactment I have quoted. No words are to be found in that enactment constituting the expenses incurred a debt due from the owners of the vessel. The only right conferred is "to recover such expenses from the owner of such vessel in a court of summary jurisdiction." I do not think the appellant can claim to recover by virtue of the statute, and at the same time insist upon doing so by means other than those prescribed by the statute which alone confers the right. It was argued for the appellant that, even if not entitled to recover the expenses by action in the High Court, he was, at all events, entitled to come to that court for a declaration that on the true interpretation of the statute he had a right to recover them. It might be enough to say that no such case was made by the appellant's claim. But, apart from this, I think it would be very mischievous to hold that when a party is compelled by statute to resort to an inferior court he can come first to the High Court to have his right to recover—the very matter relegated to the inferior court—determined. Such a proposition was not supported by authority, and is, I think, unsound in principle.

Although all your Lordships, I believe, feel compelled to dismiss the appeal on the ground I have indicated, it may be satisfactory to the parties to know that after having the case fully argued on the merits your Lordships arrive at the conclusion that the same result must have followed even if the question of jurisdiction had been determined the other way. I think the words “the owner” at the end of s. 47 do not mean the person who was owner of the vessel at the time she sank, if he had ceased to be owner before the expenses were incurred. The section does not impose upon the owner the duty of removing his vessel: it only renders it lawful for the undertakers to remove her if he does not. And in the latter part of the section the words used are “the owner,” not “such owner,” which one would have expected to find if the intention had been to refer to the same person throughout. I think the latter part of the section refers to the person who was owner at the time the expenses were incurred, and not to the person who was owner when the vessel sunk, if his ownership had ceased. In the present case (subject to the point I will mention directly) it is clear that the respondents had ceased to be owners at the time expenses were incurred. They had abandoned to the underwriters, and been paid as for a total loss. The point, however, was made by the learned counsel for the appellant that the vessel being sunk in that part of the river Ouse which was within the limits within which the undertakers of the Aire and Calder Navigation were by statute authorised to make and had made improvements, it was not competent for the owners so to abandon her as to cease to be owners within the meaning of s. 47. No authority was cited for this proposition, and I am unable to see any principle on which it can rest. Many public bodies have had committed to them the improvement of public navigable rivers by dredging, by the erection of river walls, and in other ways, but the rivers do not thereby cease to be public navigable rivers or in any way change their character, nor can the rights of the public who navigate them, in the absence of statutory enactments, thereby become different from what they were before. I move your Lordships that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

LORD WATSON.—Section 47 of the Aire and Calder Navigation Act, 1889, enlarges the provisions of s. 56 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, in two particulars. In the first place, it extends the area within which the undertakers have the power of removal beyond harbours, docks, or piers, and the approaches to the same so as to include the whole of the river Ouse within the limits of improvement defined by the special Act of 1884. In the second place, it authorises the undertakers, when they have raised a sunken vessel under their statutory powers, to detain and sell for reimbursement of the expenses which they have incurred not only such vessel or wreck, but the tackle and loading thereof.

On the night of Aug. 20, 1894, the steamship J. M. Lennard, which at that time was owned by the respondents, capsized and sank in the river Ouse within the limits of improvement defined by the Act of 1884, and therefore, in the event of the respondents failing to raise her, the undertakers were authorised to do so by s. 47 of their Act of 1889. It is a matter of admission that the sunken vessel constituted an obstruction to the navigation of the river Ouse. The J. M. Lennard was fully insured, and notice was given to the underwriters, who made an unsuccessful attempt to raise her on Aug. 30. The respondents gave notice of abandonment to the underwriters, who accepted the notice and on Sept. 5, settled with the respondents for a total loss. After the date of that settlement, but not until then, the underwriters proceeded to exercise their statutory powers of removal. They began by spending £2,778 8s. 8d. in an attempt to float the ship, which resulted in failure. They then resolved to remove the wreck by means of explosives, a result which they accomplished at a cost of £500. The appellants on April 3, 1895, brought the present suit against the respondents before the Queen's Bench Division for £3,278 8s. 11d., being the aggregate of the sums expended by the underwriters in endeavouring to raise and in removing the vessel. The claim was preferred upon two separate grounds: the first being that the respondents as owners of the ship at the time she sank were at common law responsible to the undertakers for the injury thereby done to the navigation of the river Ouse, and for all costs necessarily and reasonably incurred by them in repairing such injuries; and the second, that s. 47 of the Act of 1889 makes the persons who were the owners of the vessel at the time when she sank liable to repay such costs to the undertakers.

At present I make this observation upon their alternative claim, that, while it appears to me that the first of them might be legitimately pursued before the Queen's Bench Division, I am not satisfied that the second of them could be competently entertained except by a court of summary jurisdiction as is prescribed by s. 47. Both causes of action were insisted on before MATHEW, J., who gave judgment for the respondents with costs. His Lordship was of opinion that the undertakers, in the event of a vessel being wrecked and becoming an obstruction to the waterway of the Ouse within the limits of their navigation, have no remedy other than that which is given them by their statute. As to the second point, his Lordship held that the construction applied by this House in The Crystal (1) to s. 66 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, was equally applicable to s. 47 of the undertakers' Act of 1859. On appeal the decision of MATHEW, J., was affirmed. LORD ESHER, M.R., LOPES, L.J., and RIGBY, L.J., were all of opinion that the case, so far as founded on s. 47, was ruled by the decision of this House in The Crystal (1), and that the undertakers have no right given them to recover their outlays from persons who were owners of the ship at the time of her sinking whose ownership had ceased before their operations commenced. I do not find any reference made in the opinion delivered by the learned judges to the appellant's common law claim, which was renewed and insisted on by him at your Lordship's Bar. Upon the assumption that the courts below had jurisdiction to entertain all the questions raised in this suit, I see no reason to doubt that their decisions were right. Neither of the points pressed upon us by the appellant's counsel was of any substance, and they were consequently driven to rely upon assertion rather than argument.

I am content to rest my opinion of the merits of the case upon the reasons assigned by MATHEW, J., and the learned judges of the Court of Appeal. As already indicated, I am of opinion that the claim founded upon s. 47 of the Act of 1889 was not competently brought before the court in this suit. The only right which the undertakers had to recover from an owner is conferred by these words:

"Or the undertakers may, if they think fit, recover such expenses from the owner of such boat, barge, or vessel, in a court of summary jurisdiction."

[ The right and the remedy are given uno flatu, and the one cannot be dissociated from the other. By these words the legislature has, in my opinion, committed to the summary court exclusive jurisdiction, not merely to assess the amount of expenses to be repaid to the undertaker, but to determine by whom the amount is payable, and has, therefore, by plain implication, enacted that no other court has any authority to entertain or decide these matters. The objection is one which, in my opinion, it is pars judicis to notice, because it arises on the fact of the enactment which your Lordships are asked to enforce in this appeal. It cannot be the duty of any court to pronounce an order which will have that effect when it plainly appears that in so doing the court is using a jurisdiction which the legislature has forbidden it to exercise. The appellant's counsel maintain that your Lordships ought to substitute for a debt decree, which is the only remedy claimed under s. 47, and a declaration that, under that section, he has a right to recover from the respondents, who were admittedly the owners of the J. M. Lennard at the time when she sank. It is possible that your Lordships might accede to such a suggestion if it were necessary in order to do justice. But the matter as to which a declaration is sought is one of those exclusively submitted to the jurisdiction of the summary court. In the absence of authority I am not prepared to hold that the High Court had any power to make declaration of right with respect to any matter from which its jurisdiction is excluded by an Act of the legislature, and, were such an authority produced, I should be inclined to overrule it. The declaration which we were invited to make would be of no practical utility, and it would be an interference by a court having no jurisdiction in the matter with the plenary and exclusive jurisdiction conferred by the legislature upon another tribunal.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the order appealed from ought to be affirmed. It is in form correct, although my reasons for affirming are not the same with those which prevailed in the courts below.

The plaintiffs by their statement of claim alleged that the defendants falsely and maliciously published in China and Japan a circular containing a report of experiments comparing zinc paints manufactured by the plaintiffs with those made by the defendants, showing that the defendants' paint had a slight advantage over that of the plaintiffs, but that, for all practical purposes, they could be regarded as being equal. The plaintiffs alleged that the report was untrue, that their paint was in fact superior to that of the defendants, and that they had been injured in their trade and credit. The defendants applied, under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4, to have the statement of claim struck out as showing no reasonable cause of action.

Held: the defendants' circular was no more than a disparagement of the plaintiffs' goods, and, as such, was not actionable even if the statements contained in it were untrue; proof of special damage by the plaintiffs would not improve their case; and, therefore, judgment would be entered for the defendants.

Appeal by the defendants from an order of KENNEDY, J., in chambers.

The statement of claim in the action alleged as follows :—

G “1. The plaintiffs are a limited company, incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, and they and their predecessors have carried on business as wholesale oil merchants and paint manufacturers for upwards of 125 years. The defendants carry on a similar business, and are a company similarly incorporated.

H 2. The plaintiffs have for many years carried on a large business in the export of white zinc to the East, and in particular to China and Japan, and have acquired a great reputation there for their said white zinc.

I 3. Prior to and in or about the month of April, 1898, the defendants, by themselves or their agent acting on their behalf, and within the scope of his authority and in their interests, contriving and intending to injure the plaintiffs in their said business, falsely and maliciously printed and published, and caused to be printed and published and issued in China and Japan, and continued the publication and issue of, a circular containing of the plaintiffs and of them as such manufacturers and sellers of the said white zinc and of them in the way of their said business, the words following, that is to say : Copy of a Report on a trial of ‘Bell Brand Genuine White Zinc’ [meaning the white zinc manufactured and sold by the defendants] in comparison with Hubbuck’s Patent White Zinc [meaning the plaintiffs’ said white zinc, and meaning that the defendants’ white zinc was genuine but that of the plaintiffs was not genuine], by Fred and T. Thorne, Builders and Decorators, 266, Manchester Road, Cubitt Town, London, E. Paint covering experiments.—The undermentioned experiments were conducted at Storer's Wharf, Poplar, London, E., under our supervision, and we certify that the particulars hereunder given are correct in every detail: 32lb. Hubbuck's Patent White Zinc were thinned by adding 16lb. of a mixture containing two parts of pale boiled oil and one part of turpentine. 32lb. of Wilkinson, Heywood & Clark, Ltd.'s Genuine White Zinc Paint were thinned by adding exactly the same quantity of the same mixture as in the case of Hubbuck's. In order to eliminate all chance of unfair comparison, we caused both samples of stiff paint to be tested for percentage of oil, and found that they both contained  $15\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Both lots of paint had the same consistency and appearance, except that Wilkinson, Heywood & Clark's struck us as being the better white of the two. A square of match boarding representing 384 square feet was knotted and primed with two coats of priming, and afterwards each alternate board was painted black. One half of this board was painted with Hubbuck's zinc and the other half with W., H. & C.'s. The paint was applied in the usual way by an experienced workman, care being taken that no drops or splashes were lost. The board was 6ft. high, and lines one foot apart were drawn right across its whole length, so that the first coat of paint was applied over the whole of its respective portion of the boarding or test board. The following coat commenced within a foot from the bottom, and so on with each succeeding coat until the fifth coat was applied. By this means it was easy to judge the density and therefore the value of each coat. Exactly 9lb. of paint was used in each case, and each coat took the same quantity of paint. Judging the finished work, it is quite evident that W., H. & C.'s zinc has a slight advantage over Hubbuck's, but for all practical purposes they can be regarded as being in every respect equal. (Signed) Fred and T. Thorne. I certify the above to be a copy of the original report.—W. D. Graham, manager of Wilkinson, Heywood & Clark, Ltd. (proprietors of David Storer & Sons), Praya Central, Hong-kong.'

4. By the said words the defendants meant that the white zinc of the defendants was superior to that of the plaintiffs, or that it was at least equal thereto at a much cheaper price, and that the white zinc of the plaintiffs was adulterated and not genuine, and that persons purchasing white zinc from the plaintiffs would do better by purchasing that of the defendants.

5. The said report was untrue, and each statement thereof was untrue, and the alleged trial had not been made or fairly made or made with the alleged results.

6. The white zinc of the plaintiffs is in fact superior to that of the defendants and not of an inferior or equal quality.

7. The plaintiffs have by reason of the premises been much injured in their trade and business, and the reputation of their said white zinc and of themselves, as the manufacturers thereof, has been much injured, and the plaintiffs have been injured in their credit and have been prevented from acquiring the profits which they might and otherwise would have acquired by reason of the said libel."

The plaintiffs claimed damages and an injunction restraining the defendants from further publishing "the said libel," or further libelling the plaintiffs as manufacturers, or their business. The defendants applied under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4, to have the statement of claim struck out as showing no reasonable cause of action. The master ordered the statement of claim to be struck out unless the plaintiffs amended it by averring special damage with full particulars within four months. This decision was reversed by KENNEDY, J., in chambers, who ordered "that the statement of claim do stand as already delivered," and from this decision the defendants appealed.

Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., and Montague Lush for the defendants.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and W. O. Hodges for the plaintiffs.

Nov. 8, 1898. SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R., read the following judgment of the court.—This is an appeal by the defendants from the refusal of KENNEDY, J., to strike out the plaintiffs' statement of claim on the ground that it discloses no reasonable cause of action.

The application is made under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4. Order 25 abolished demurrers, and substituted a more summary process for getting rid of pleadings which show no reasonable cause of action or defence. Two courses are open to a defendant who wishes to raise the question whether, assuming a statement of claim to be proved, it entitles the plaintiff to relief. One method is to raise the question of law as directed by Ord. 25, r. 2; the other is to apply to strike out the statement of claim under Ord. 25, r. 4. The first method is appropriate to cases requiring argument and careful consideration. The second and more summary procedure is only appropriate to cases which are plain and obvious, so that any master or judge can say at once that the statement of claim as it stands is insufficient, even if proved, to entitle the plaintiff to what he asks. The use of the expression, "reasonable cause of action" in r. 4, shows that the summary procedure there introduced is only intended to be had recourse to in plain and obvious cases.

The authorities collected in the ANNUAL PRACTICE show that the courts have always so construed r. 4, although sometimes, no doubt, a statement of claim may be so long and the facts so complicated that considerable time and attention are required to ascertain their true result, as in Peru Republic v. Peruvian Guano Co. (4). If in this case it were necessary, in order to justify us in striking out the statement of claim, to come to the conclusion that Western Counties Manure Co. v. Lawes Chemical Manure Co. (5) was not law, and was in effect overruled by White v. Mellin (3), we should be of opinion that the question raised was too difficult and important to justify the court in summarily striking out the claim. But it is not necessary to consider any such question. The truth is that the defendants' circular, when attentively read, comes to no more than a statement that the defendants' white zinc is equal to and, indeed, somewhat better than the plaintiffs'. Such a statement, even if untrue and the cause of loss to the plaintiffs, is not a cause of action. Moreover, an allegation that the statement was made maliciously is not enough to convert what is prima facie a lawful into a prima facie unlawful statement. It is not unlawful to say that one's own goods are better than other people's, and Allen v. Flood (6) shows that malice in such a case is immaterial. The fact that the defendants call their white zinc genuine, and contrast it with the plaintiffs' patent white zinc, which is not called genuine, is relied on by the plaintiffs as showing that the circular is, or may be fairly regarded as, a defamatory libel on the plaintiffs—i.e., a libel on them in the way of their trade. But when the whole circular is looked at, and it is found that the defendants state that, for all practical purposes, the two contrasted paints are in every respect equal, it is impossible to treat the circular as anything more than a disparagement of the white zinc paint made and sold by the plaintiffs. No ingenuity can convert the circular into a defamatory libel on the plaintiffs, and, if the action went to trial, it would be the duty of the judge to tell the jury that no question of libel on the plaintiffs had to be considered.

We will now consider the circular in its other aspect—viz., as a disparagement of the plaintiffs' goods. From this point of view the case is undistinguishable from Evans v. Harlow (1) and Young v. Macrae (2), where malice, falsehood, and damage were all alleged, and yet it was held that what the defendant there published was not actionable. The ground of the decisions in both cases was that for a person in trade to puff his own wares and to proclaim their superiority over those of his rivals is not actionable. The principle laid down in these cases has never been questioned, and it has been emphatically approved in White v. Mellin (3). The defendants in this case give the results of some experiments with the two sorts of paint, and in para. 5 of the statement of claim the plaintiffs say that the report of the experiments is untrue and that the trials were not fairly made. But, supposing this to be the case, the result is not altered. Paragraph 5 merely states more particularly what has been already stated before in para. 3, where the general charge of falsehood is made. Even if each particular charge of falsehood is established it will only come to this—that it is untrue that the defendants' paint is better than, or equal to, that of the plaintiffs', for saying which no action lies. The particular reasons for making that statement are immaterial if the statement itself is not actionable. The statement of claim, then, as it stands, shows no reasonable cause of action, and the only other question is whether the plaintiffs should have liberty to amend by stating special damage as distinguished from general damage. A

In Evans v. Harlow (1), all the members of the court agreed that the declaration showed no cause of action. PATTESON, J., however, went on to say that an action for disparaging the plaintiffs' goods would not lie unless the plaintiff alleged that, by reason of the disparagement, he had been prevented from selling his goods to some particular person. But in Young v. Macrae (2), it was pointed out that there were different ways of disparaging a man's goods—that some false statements about them might be actionable if special damage could be proved, and Western Counties Manure Co. v. Lawes Chemical Manure Co. (5) was decided on this ground. But in Young v. Macrae (2) it was also pointed out that, if the only false statement complained of is that the defendant's goods are better than the plaintiff's, such a statement is not actionable, even if the plaintiff is damnified by it. The judgments of COCKBURN, C.J., and of WIGHTMAN, J., who was a party to the decision in Evans v. Harlow (1), are clear on this point. LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., expressed himself very emphatically to the same effect in White v. Mellin (3) ([1895] A.C. at pp. 164, 165), and he expressed his clear opinion that it could make no difference whether a defendant said that his goods were better than the plaintiff's generally or whether the particulars in which the plaintiff's goods were said to be inferior were specified. He pointed out with great force that, if actions in such cases were held to lie, the courts would be constantly engaged in trying the respective merits of the goods of rival traders, and the pernicious practice of bringing actions for mere purposes of advertising would be greatly encouraged. See also Empire Type-setting Machine Co. of New York v. Linotype Co., Ltd. (7). C

The present plaintiffs' case would not, therefore, be improved by the allegation and proof of actual loss. In other words, compliance with the master's order requiring more definite allegation of special damage would not improve the plaintiffs' case. The plaintiffs do allege actual loss attributable to the defendants' circular, and, if proof of such loss would enable the plaintiffs to maintain their action, it would be wrong summarily to strike out their statement of claim, although it might have been open to a demurrer before the Judicature Acts: see on this point Ratcliffe v. Evans (8). We regard this case as falling within the principle established by Evans v. Harlow (1), Young v. Macrae (2), and White v. Mellin (3). F

It is not necessary to consider how the case would have stood if the defendants had not been rival traders, simply puffing their own goods and comparing theirs with those of the plaintiffs. If the defendants had made untrue statements concerning the plaintiffs' goods beyond saying that they were inferior to, or at all events not better than, those of the defendants, or if the defendants were not rivals in trade and had no lawful excuse for what they said, it would not have been right summarily to strike out the statement of claim as showing no reasonable cause of action. But the circular complained of is such as plainly to constitute no cause of action even if all the allegations in the statement of claim are true. H

Under these circumstances, the appeal must be allowed, with costs here and below; and, as there is no reason to suppose that the plaintiffs can improve their case by any amendments they can make, the court ought to exercise the power conferred upon it by Ord. 25, r. 4, and order judgment to be entered for the defendants. I

ROWELL v. ROWELL

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., A. L. Smith and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.), November 2, 1899]

By a covenant in a separation deed the husband agreed to pay the wife a weekly sum during their joint lives if they should so long live separate from each other. While they were living apart, the husband, by means of certain statements concerning his health, prevailed on the wife to allow him to have intercourse with her on four occasions. From the husband's diary which was put in evidence, it was clear that for some time after the acts of intercourse he was making overtures to persuade the wife to live with him. Nearly a year after the acts of intercourse the husband stopped paying the wife the weekly sums under the covenant. In an action by the wife to recover the arrears of payments under the deed,

Held: in the circumstances of the case, the acts of intercourse were not conclusive evidence of a reconciliation between the parties, so as to put an end to the deed, and, accordingly, the husband was liable to pay the arrears owing.

Appeal by the husband from a decision of GRANTHAM, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by the wife against her husband to recover the sum of £90, being the amount of the arrears for forty-five weeks from Jan. 1, 1898, up to Nov. 12, 1898, when the writ was issued, due to her under a covenant in a separation deed whereby the husband had agreed to pay her £2 a week so long as they should live separate from each other. The separation deed was as follows:

“This indenture made the 5th day of March, 1896, between John Reed Rowell, of 14, Sackville Street, in the county of London, tailor, of the one part, and Harriette Elizabeth Rowell, wife of the said J. R. Rowell, of the other part. Whereas unhappy differences have arisen between the said J. R. Rowell and H. E. Rowell, his wife, and they have agreed to live separate from each other for the future and to enter into such arrangements as are hereinafter expressed. And whereas the said J. R. Rowell and H. E. Rowell, his wife, have one child only, namely, John Reed Rowell, now of the age of eight years. Now this indenture witnesseth that in pursuance of the said agreement and in consideration of the premises and of the covenants of the said H. E. Rowell hereinafter contained the said J. R. Rowell hereby covenants with the said H. E. Rowell that so long as the said H. E. Rowell performs all the covenants and agreements on her part hereinafter contained the said H. E. Rowell shall and may at all times hereafter, notwithstanding her coverture, live separate and apart from the said J. R. Rowell as if she were a feme sole and shall be freed from the control and authority of the said J. R. Rowell and shall reside in such place or places and in such manner as she shall think fit and that the said J. R. Rowell will not require her to live with him and will not institute any legal proceedings or take any other steps whatsoever for that purpose and will not in anywise molest or interfere with the said H. E. Rowell in her manner of living or otherwise. And also that the said J. R. Rowell will during the joint lives of himself and the said H. E. Rowell if they should so long live separate from each other and the said H. E. Rowell shall live a chaste life and observe the covenants and agreements on her part hereinafter contained pay to the said H. E. Rowell the weekly sum of £1 10s. for her sole and separate use without power of anticipation. And also shall and will during his life, if the said J. R. Rowell (his son) shall so long remain under the age of twenty-one years and reside with or under the tutelage or care of the said H. E. Rowell and if the said H. E. Rowell shall so long perform and observe the stipulations on her part herein contained, pay to the said H. E. Rowell the further sum of 10s. per week for and towards the support, maintenance, board, lodging, clothing, and education of the said J. R. Rowell (the son), the said weekly sums of £1 10s. and 10s. making together the weekly sum of £2 to be paid to the credit of the said H. E. Rowell in her account at the Birkbeck Bank, Chancery Lane, in the county of London aforesaid. And also that all property (if any) of the said H. E. Rowell which but for this covenant would belong to or be receivable by the said J. R. Rowell in her right shall be held and enjoyed by her, the said H. E. Rowell, for her sole and separate use. And that if the said H. E. Rowell shall die in the lifetime of the said J. R. Rowell all property (if any) of the said H. E. Rowell which but for this covenant would on her death go and belong to the said J. R. Rowell in his marital right or as her administrator or as tenant by the curtesy shall go to the person or persons and in the manner to whom and in which the same would have gone if the said J. R. Rowell had died in her lifetime. Now this indenture witnesseth that in further pursuance of the said agreement and in consideration of the premises the said H. E. Rowell hereby covenants with the said J. R. Rowell that she will out of the provision made for her by these presents or otherwise provide and pay for all such necessary and other board, lodging, clothing, ornaments, medical attendance, comforts, recreation, and things whatsoever as she may now or hereafter require or obtain and shall in all respects support and maintain herself and shall pay and discharge all the debts, engagements, and liabilities which she may incur or enter into in respect of the matters aforesaid or if any other matters shall indemnify the said J. R. Rowell, his heirs, executors, and administrators, therefrom and from all actions, claims, proceedings, costs, damages and expenses, demands and liability on account thereof. And that she shall and will from time to time with and out of the said further sum of 10s. per week hereinbefore agreed to be paid by the said J. R. Rowell and without any further assistance from the said J. R. Rowell support, maintain, board, lodge, clothe, and educate the said J. R. Rowell (the son) in a suitable manner and supply him with all things necessary or proper and shall and will indemnify the said J. R. Rowell from all actions, proceedings, costs, damages, claims, demands, and liability on account thereof. And also that she will henceforth live separate and apart from the said J. R. Rowell and shall not in any way molest, annoy, or interfere with the said J. R. Rowell. In witness whereof the said parties to these presents have hereunto set hands and seals the day and year first above written."

Up to the spring of 1897 the parties lived apart, and all the covenants therein were duly observed. In 1897, they frequently met each other on friendly terms, sometimes dining together at restaurants and going together to the theatre, and he at times used to take afternoon tea with her in the house where she lived, and where she earned a livelihood by letting lodgings. In April, 1897, the husband made some statements which concerned his health, by means of which he prevailed upon the wife to allow him to have marital intercourse with her on four occasions. They still continued, however, to occupy separate houses, and on no occasion did they spend a night under the same roof. The wife, who was the only witness called at the trial, stated that neither he nor she had any intention at the time of putting an end to the separation deed. The husband continued after this for a time to pay her a weekly allowance for the support of herself and their child who lived with her. From the husband's diary which was put in evidence it appeared that, in the autumn of 1897, he was still making overtures to the wife for a reconciliation, GRANTHAM, J., gave judgment for the wife. The husband appealed.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J. This case seems to me to be by no means free from difficulty. The action is brought by a wife against her husband to recover money alleged to be due under a covenant in a separation deed. The action was tried before GRANTHAM, J., without a jury, and the only witness called was the wife.

The deed on which the action is brought was entered into by the husband and wife on Mar. 5, 1896. I will begin by saying that the deed is nothing more than a separation deed, and there is, therefore, no necessity to pay heed to observations made by judges on cases where a deed has contained other matters collateral to, and independent of, the subject of the separation of the husband and wife. This deed, then, being simply a separation deed, recites that differences have arisen between the parties, that they have agreed to separate, and that there is one child of the marriage. It then contains these covenants: It is clear that with regard to these sums of £1 10s. and 10s. to be paid by the husband to the wife, the covenant to pay is not absolute. The husband's liability under the covenant to pay the £1 10s. would come to an end if the parties ceased to live separate, and his liability to pay the 10s. would come to an end if the child ceased to reside with, or be under the care of its mother. It appears from the evidence that, after the separation, the wife kept a lodging-house, and that the husband sometimes visited her there. On four occasions in 1897 the husband prevailed on her to allow him to have connection with her. Besides this they often met in a more or less friendly way, and sometimes dined together at restaurants and went to the theatre. But after the four acts of intercourse they still continued to live apart in the real sense of the words, each at his or her own house, and he kept up until Jan. 1, 1898, the payments of the £1 10s. and the 10s. which he had covenanted to pay.

In my judgment, if the court were to arrive at the conclusion that the parties intended a real reconciliation, the whole deed would be at an end. The question is whether the facts warrant the court in coming to that conclusion. The onus of proving a reconciliation lies on the husband. The wife was the only witness called.

and she says that, in April, 1897, her husband came to her with a story of what his doctor told him, and in consequence of what he said she consented on four occasions to acts of marital intercourse. They were on friendly terms at that time, but she did not consider the deed at an end, nor did he. He was still paying her money under the deed, and she was taking care of the child. Suppose that the husband obtained judgment in this action, what would be the condition of the child? According to the terms of the deed, the boy is to be under the care of his mother. The husband is to be in no way liable for the boy's keep, and the wife is to indemnify him for any costs that may be imposed on him by law in respect of the child. If there had really been a reconciliation between the parties, the deed would have come to an end, and the boy would, therefore, cease to be under the care of his mother. The husband would be responsible for the boy. But here we find that the boy has continued all along under the care of his mother. This does not look as if the parties ever came to such a reconciliation as would put an end to the deed. But it was argued on behalf of the husband that the four acts of marital intercourse were enough to constitute a reconciliation.

No case has been cited to show that the mere fact of a few intermittent acts of connection between husband and wife would put an end to a separation deed. I agree that such acts, if unexplained, would be strong evidence, though not full proof, I think, of reconciliation. The circumstances under which such acts took place must be taken into consideration. Here we find that the wife was only induced to permit these acts by means of some extravagant statements made by the husband, and it appears that neither he nor she considered that any reconciliation had really taken place. From the husband's diary which was put in evidence it is clear that for some time after these four acts he was making overtures to the wife to live with him. For these reasons, I think that the husband has not discharged the onus which lay on him of proving a reconciliation, and the judgment of GRANTHAM, J., must be affirmed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The action is brought by a wife against her husband for arrears of money payable by the husband under a covenant in a separation deed. His covenant is to pay so long as he and she should live separate, and the husband's case is that, as they have come together again, the deed is void. I think that he has failed to prove his case, and I agree with all that my lord has said as to this. Proof of intercourse between a husband and wife would, in itself, be strong prima facie evidence of a reconciliation such as would probably put an end to a separation deed; but in the present case I think that counsel for the husband went too far in contending that the acts of intercourse were in themselves proof of reconciliation between the parties. The cases seem to me to go to this extent, that where there is a simple separation deed, such as we have here, it is put an end to by a reconciliation. The question for the court here is whether there has been a reconciliation. My Lord has dealt with the facts, and I agree that they do not show a reconciliation in the full sense of the word. Neither party intended a reconciliation, and neither thought that, by what had occurred, an end was put to the deed. The circumstances under which the acts of intercourse took place show that this is so, as well as the subsequent behaviour of the husband. I think that the judgment of GRANTHAM, J., was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. A separation deed, like other kinds of deeds, is subject to this incident, that it is to be construed according to what is contained within the four corners of it. It is not safe to say, as a rule, that this or that particular event will put an end to a separation deed. In each case the words of the deed itself must be looked at. Here, the husband's covenant to pay his wife is to last for their joint lives if they should so long live separate. We have to find out what the parties meant by that. In my opinion, they meant that, notwithstanding any acts of marital intercourse, they had decided to live separate from each other. I also wish to add this: I conceive that a separation deed might be so worded that, though such clauses of it as were dependent on the husband and wife living separate might come to an end, yet, according to the true intention of the parties, the property clauses might still remain in force notwithstanding that the husband and wife resumed cohabitation.

R. v. COCKSHOTT AND OTHERS

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Wright and Darling, JJ.), March 3, 1898]

Magistrates—Procedure—Right of accused to claim trial by jury—Failure to inform accused of right—Quashing of conviction—Need for conviction to state accused was informed.

Failure by a court of summary jurisdiction to inform the accused, before the charge against him was gone into, that he had a right to claim trial by jury, pursuant to s. 17 (2) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 [now s. 25 (3) of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952], held to render the conviction bad. It was not, however, necessary that the conviction should state that the accused had been informed of his right.

Semble, an accused could not waive the right given to him by s. 17.

The defendant was charged with an offence carrying, on summary conviction, imprisonment for more than three months. When the case was called on the justices' clerk was about to remind the justices to inform the defendant of his right to claim trial by jury under s. 17 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, but desisted when he saw that the advocates were conferring on whether the defendant should plead Guilty. In the event the case proceeded without the justices having informed the defendant, pursuant to s. 17 (2), of this right, the defendant first pleading Not Guilty to the charge and later changing his plea to Guilty. The defendant was convicted and fined. In affidavits sworn by the defendant he said that he would have elected to be tried by a jury had he known of his right, and by his solicitors that they were ignorant of the defendant's right.

Held: since the caution in s. 17 (2) of the Act of 1879 had not been read to the defendant before he pleaded to the charge, the conviction was bad and must be quashed.

Notes. The relevant provisions of s. 17 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, are now contained, with modifications, in s. 25 (1), (2) and (3) of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952. Section 25 (1) of the Act of 1952 has been amended by the Sexual Offences Act, 1956, s. 48 and Sched. 3.

Rule Nisi for a writ of certiorari to bring up to be quashed a conviction under s. 3 of the Betting Act, 1853, by the justices of the borough of Southport.

On Nov. 6, 1897, Joshua Rickerby was convicted of using an office at 7, Market Passage, Southport, for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto upon horse-races. It was contended that the conviction should be quashed since it did not appear from the conviction that the justices, before going into the charge, informed Rickerby that he had a right to be tried by a jury, and that, in fact, the justices did not so inform him.

On Nov. 6 the clerk to the justices, as the case was called on, was about to hand up a card to the chairman of the bench containing the statutory notice that the defendant might elect to be tried by a jury; but, seeing that a consultation was going on as to whether the defendant should plead Guilty, he desisted, and the case was continued without the notice being read at all, the defendant first of all pleading Not Guilty, so that his solicitor might cross-examine. After some evidence had been given on oath, the defendant, by the advice of his solicitors, pleaded Guilty. The justices fined him £50. Affidavits were filed on behalf of Rickerby to the effect that he would have elected to be tried by a jury if he had known that he had the right to do so. His solicitors also swore that they did not know that he had that right.

For the justices it was contended that by pleading guilty the accused waived his right to claim trial by jury under s. 17 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879. For the accused, Rickerby, it was submitted that under s. 17, informing the accused of his right to trial by jury was a condition precedent to the court's jurisdiction, and accordingly the conviction was bad and should be quashed.

J. R. Randolph for Rickerby.

WRIGHT, J.—To my mind this is a case of great importance. Rickerby was brought up before the justices on a charge under the Betting Act, 1853, a conviction for which might render him liable to imprisonment for six months with hard labour. The offence, therefore, was within s. 17 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, as being an offence

“in respect of the commission of which an offender is liable on summary conviction to be imprisoned for a term exceeding three months, and which is not an assault.”

That section further provides that a person “may on appearing before the court and before the charge is gone into, but not afterwards, claim to be tried by a jury,” and thereupon the court shall deal with it as if it were an indictable offence. The second sub-section provides:

“A court of summary jurisdiction, before the charge is gone into in respect of an offence to which this section applies, for the purpose of informing the defendant of his right to be tried by a jury in pursuance of this section, shall address him to the following effect: 'You are charged with an offence in respect of the commission of which you are entitled, if you desire it, instead of being dealt with summarily, to be tried by a jury. Do you desire to be tried by a jury?' "

HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts, and continued: The first point raised was that the conviction must state the fact of the caution having been given; but that was not persisted in, and, in my opinion, that is not a good point, as s. 27 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act only applies to indictable offences tried summarily. It was then pointed out that the person charged must make his election "before the charge is gone into, but not afterwards." Then is it essential to the jurisdiction that this notice should be given? This power of electing is of no use to the person charged unless he knew that he had it. He must have the knowledge of his right to elect. That shows that it is necessary that the information should be given to him before the one opportunity on which he could make use of it has passed away. I think we have no right to fritter away the protection given to prisoners. The option is to be put to each prisoner before the charge is gone into, and the bench should ask him and give him the option whether he pleads guilty or not guilty. I think the chance should always be given. It is not material whether he knows of the right, but the option should always be stated. There can be no waiver of a right by a person entirely ignorant that he possessed such a right. The affidavits are all to the effect that neither the defendant nor his solicitors knew of the right to trial by jury. Moreover, I doubt very much whether there could be a waiver under this section, even if they had known.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. To accept the suggestion that the caution should be given after the plea had been taken would do away with the protection given by s. 17 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act. The exact time when the claim to have his trial by jury should be made by a prisoner is on appearing before the court and before the charge is gone into. The knowledge of his right may make all the difference in a plea by a prisoner. It must not be assumed in the case as a presumption of law that the prisoner or even the solicitors for him knew the law, for the statute made in effect an exception to the presumption by providing in terms that the information must be given.

Insurance—Marine insurance—Freight—Exception of “claim consequent on loss of time whether arising from peril of the sea or otherwise”—Damage caused by peril of the sea—Delay caused by repairs—Cancellation of charter.

A time policy of insurance on freight contained the following exception clause: “Warranted free from any claim consequent on loss of time, whether arising from a peril of the sea or otherwise.” After the commencement of the voyage the ship sustained damage from a peril of the sea, and returned to her port of loading. The necessary repairs caused a delay which frustrated the object of the venture, and the charterers, as they were entitled to do, cancelled the charter and the freight was totally lost. The shipowners sued the insurers for the loss of freight.

Held: the claim was consequent on loss of time within the exception clause and the underwriters were not liable.

Appeal by the plaintiffs in the action from an order of the Court of Appeal [1897] 1 Q.B. 29, reversing a decision of HENN COLLINS, J., 75 L.T. 155, in their favour.

The action was brought by the appellants, the owners of the steamship Peninsular, against the respondents, as underwriters, to recover a total loss under a policy of marine insurance for £1,500 on freight valued at £2,500 covering only the risk of total or constructive total loss and general average. The action was tried before HENN COLLINS, J., on June 15, 1896, when the following facts were proved or admitted. On April 3, 1895, the Portuguese government contracted with the Empreza Nacional and others for the transport of troops and stores from Lisbon to Lorenzo Marques. In pursuance of that contract a subsidiary contract was entered into on April 5, 1895, between the Empreza Nacional and the appellants, by which it was provided that the Peninsular should transport certain of the troops and should also load and carry a cargo of government stores from Lisbon to Lorenzo Marques, and that the Empreza Nacional, in addition to the sum to be paid for the transport of the troops, should pay to the appellants eight days after the arrival of the Peninsular at Lorenzo Marques, and after having received the same from the Portuguese government, the sum of fifteen million reis freight for the cargo. The Peninsular loaded the cargo at Lisbon, and sailed for Lorenzo Marques on April 15, being one of four transports carrying troops and stores which were urgently required by the Portuguese government at Lorenzo Marques. On the following day, April 16, the main shaft of the Peninsular broke by perils of the seas, and she had to be towed back to Lisbon, where she arrived on April 19. On April 20 she was surveyed, and it was found that the damage she had sustained by the perils of the seas could not be repaired at Lisbon, and that she must be taken to Cadiz to be repaired. All her cargo was thereupon discharged at Lisbon. The delay necessary

A for the purpose of taking the Peninsular to Cadiz, and repairing her, was such as to frustrate the objects of the adventure, and the Portuguese government and the Empresa Nacional put an end to the appellants' contract and refused to carry it out. It was proved that by Portuguese law they were entitled to do so, and that no freight was payable to the appellants, who totally lost their freight. The policy and the question in the case was whether or not this clause freed the respondents from liability for the loss of freight claimed by the appellants.
B contained the following clause :

“Warranted free from any claim consequent on loss of time, whether arising from a peril of the sea or otherwise;”

C Bigham, Q.C., Bucknill, Q.C., and Leck for the appellants.
J. Walton, Q.C., and Scrutton for the respondents.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—This case has been very ably argued for the appellants, but I think that none of your Lordships entertain any doubt as to the D conclusion at which we must arrive. If the words on which the question turns are to be read as part of the contract, it is impossible to support the judgment of HENN COLLINS, J. The words, if they are part of the contract, seem to be very plain. They are these :

“Warranted free from any claim consequent upon loss of time arising from E a peril of the sea or otherwise.”

The Peninsular (the vessel insured by a policy which contained these words by way of exception) broke her main shaft. It is not denied that if it had been capable of being repaired within such time as would have enabled her to complete the adventure, there would have been no loss of freight. The reason why there was a
F loss of freight was that the repairs would have taken so long a time as would have defeated the adventure. That is how the loss of freight arose.

It has been assumed—and, indeed, it underlies the whole of the judgment of HENN COLLINS, J.—that the right to insist upon the payment of the insurance money as upon a total loss of the freight was consummate at the moment the main shaft broke. There is a fallacy underlying that form of the argument, namely,
G that there must be a sufficiently ascertained condition of damage to show at once that the loss must have accrued, because the damage was of such a character that it could not be repaired in the time. It would be only a question of evidence which one might ascertain at that time, or wait until the facts had proved it by the occurrence of those facts subsequently. But the reason why the loss of freight has been incurred must be that the damage was of such a character that there was
H an impossibility of prosecuting the voyage within the time within which it was necessary to prosecute it. The facts here have been ascertained, and we now know why the freight was lost. Why was it? Not simpliciter because the main shaft was broken, but because the main shaft was broken under special circumstances—that is, at a distance from any place where it could be repaired within such a time as would have enabled the vessel to prosecute her voyage.

I Then the question comes whether that is included in the language I have read, “warranted free from any claim consequent upon loss of time arising from a peril of the sea, or otherwise.”

The main shaft being broken in consequence of a peril of the sea, what is the consequence of that? The consequence of that is that the vessel cannot, within the time, perform the voyage. Is that, or is it not, a “claim consequent upon loss of time arising from a peril of the sea.” If this exception is part of the contract, and if it is applicable to the contract into which the parties have entered; I really am wholly incapable of following the argument that the present claim does not come literally within the words. There is a sort of faint effort made to suggest A that it is not part of the contract at all. Nobody says that it is not; nobody has ever ventured to say in terms that it is not, but there is a sort of insinuation to the effect that this warranty is only upon a piece of paper pasted on the margin of the policy. What is the relevancy of that? It either is, or is not, part of the contract. If it is part of the contract it is perfectly immaterial what part of the contract it appears in. It might as well have been incorporated in the original policy itself. B

But then it is said—or when I say it is said, perhaps that is overstating it—it is rather suggested that this may not have been a sort of stipulation that was applicable to the particular contract which the parties were making. It appears to me that this case itself shows that these words can receive a reasonable and intelligible meaning as applicable to the contract into which the parties were entering. Then why am I to reject the clause. Is it because it is pasted on? Is it because it is C aside of the rest of the contract? No one can gravely suggest that. Then I have to construe this as part of the contract, and, as I have already said, this case furnishes an illustration of what the parties were intending to do. They intended to except out of the liability they had otherwise entered into a claim which was consequent upon loss of time arising from a peril of the sea. If the claim was consequent upon loss of time occasioned in that way, then the warranty was to D apply. This claim seems to me to be in the strictest sense consequent upon loss of time so occasioned in any ordinary and reasonable meaning that can be put upon the words. Therefore I think that the judgment of the court below was perfectly right, and I move your Lordships that it be affirmed.

LORD WATSON.—In this case I think that it is part of the appellants' own E case that the breaking of the shaft of the Peninsular, owing to a peril of the sea, rendered inevitable such delay in the prosecution of her voyage as entitled the charterer to determine the adventure. The loss of freight, in my opinion, was consequent upon that delay in this sense, that but for delay occasioned by the breaking of the shaft there would have been no loss to claim. The only question F that remains is whether the clause, which is one of the conditions pasted upon the document forming the contract between the parties, is to receive effect or no. For my own part, I think that there has been no cause whatever shown for rejecting it, and I can only add that I entirely agree with the opinions expressed by the learned judges of the Court of Appeal, because I think with them that the case which occurs here falls precisely within the words of the exception, which are G introduced by the conditions. I therefore concur in the judgment which has been moved.

LORD HERSCHELL.—This a policy against total loss of freight. The learned counsel for the appellants were unable to suggest any case or class of cases to which the words of the warranty would apply unless it were to such a case as is H now before your Lordships. I quite agree that, if you find in a policy, as you commonly do, a number of stipulations inserted, and, with reference to the subject-matter of a policy, one of those stipulations is on its natural construction inapplicable, it would not be right for the purpose of finding a meaning for that as applicable to that particular contract to torture or strain its language. The natural conclusion would be that the common form had been used with the insertion of certain I warranties or conditions not applicable to the particular case as the policy was completed. This is, of course, not an uncommon occurrence. But if with reference to the subject-matter of the policy the particular stipulation is applicable without any straining or torturing of the language then it is the duty of the court construing the contract to give that natural meaning and construction to it as applicable to the subject-matter of the contract.

Can these words be properly applied to a policy against total loss of freight? It seems to me that they can, and that the present case is an illustration of a

A perfectly proper application of them. The whole basis of the claim, of course, must be the loss of the subject-matter insured—that is, the freight. That loss must arise from one of the perils insured against. What is the meaning of saying that the underwriter is not to be liable for any claim consequent upon loss of time? It must mean that, although the subject-matter insured has been lost, and although it has been lost by a peril insured against, if the claim depends on loss of time in the prosecution of the voyage, so that the adventure cannot be completed within the time contemplated, then the underwriter is to be exempt from liability. It seems to me not only is no violence done to the words but that they receive the natural, the ordinary, and reasonable signification when they are applied to such a case as this.

C LORD SHAND and LORD DAVEY concurred.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from Lichfield County Court. A

The action was an action of detinue brought by the plaintiffs to recover two gold rings as the property of the plaintiffs, found by the defendant in the Minster Pool, Lichfield. The plaintiffs claimed the return of the rings, or £5 for their value, and £1 damages for their detention. The plaintiffs were the freeholders by a conveyance dated Jan. 6, 1872, from the mayor, aldermen, and citizens of Lichfield, of land covered by the Minster Pool in Lichfield. The defendant was employed by the plaintiffs in August, 1895, with about forty other labourers, to clean out the pool, and while the defendant was so employed he found in the mud from the bottom of the pool the two gold rings in question. The plaintiffs demanded the rings from the defendant, but he refused to deliver them up, and the present action was then brought. It was proved as a fact that there was no special contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant as to the giving up any articles that might be found. The learned judge decided, upon the authority of Armory v. Delamirie (2), and Bridges v. Hawkesworth (1), that the defendant had a good title against all the world except the true owner. He, therefore, gave a verdict for the defendant with costs, and gave the plaintiffs leave to appeal upon the terms that the plaintiffs should pay the defendant's costs in any event. The plaintiffs appealed. B

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—In this case I think that the learned county court judge was wrong, and that his judgment must be reversed. The case is an interesting one, and raises an interesting question. The action is brought to recover two gold rings from the defendant, and the defendant does not deny the detention of the rings, but he denies the plaintiffs' right to claim them. The plaintiffs are the owners in fee of certain land, on which this pool was situate, and for some purpose of their own the plaintiffs employed persons—amongst others the defendant—to clean out the pool. In the course of that cleaning several articles of interest were found, and amongst them these two rings. The plaintiffs were the freeholders of the pool, and they had the right to enjoin on those whom they employed what they were to do with the contents, or any part of the contents, of the pool. E

It is no doubt correct, as was contended on behalf of the defendant, that before the plaintiffs can succeed they must make out that they had an actual control over the locus in quo, that is, the pool, and over the contents of the pool. Can it be said, under the circumstances of this case, that the Minster Pool and the contents of it were not under the control of the plaintiffs? I think they were under the control of the plaintiffs, just as the piece of iron found in the canal in R. v. Rowe (3) was held to be under the control of the canal company, although they were ignorant of the fact that it was there. G

I think that the principle on which this case ought to be decided is well laid down, and also the distinction between this case and Bridges v. Hawkesworth (1) is well drawn, in POLLOCK AND WRIGHT ON POSSESSION, pp. 40, 41, where it is said, speaking of Bridges v. Hawkesworth (1):

“A case like this illustrates the importance both of grasping the preliminary conception of facts and of keeping it clear from the supervening questions of right. The finder's right starts from the absence of any de facto control at the moment of finding. And decisions which seem contradictory must not be pronounced to be really so before we have attended to the possibility of differences of fact, which, though minute in themselves, may be material in their consequences. Thus in Bridges v. Hawkesworth (1) the court did not say that an object dropped by a guest in a private dwelling-house would not be in the custody of the master—‘within the protection of his house’—and therefore in I his possession; and PATTESON, J., did say that an innkeeper would have possession in the like case. . . . The possession of land carries with it in general, by our law, possession of everything which is attached to or under that land, and, in the absence of a better title elsewhere, the right to possess it also. And it makes no difference that the possessor is not aware of the thing's existence. So it was lately held concerning a prehistoric boat imbedded in the soil: Elwes v. Brigg Gas Co. (4). It is free to any one who requires a specific intention as part of de facto possession to treat this as a positive rule of law. But it seems preferable to say that the legal possession rests on a real de facto possession, constituted by the occupier's general power and intent to exclude unauthorised interference."

I think that passage is distinctly applicable to this case, and it shows the broad distinction between this case and the cases referred to for the defendant, and especially some of the cases where things were cast away into a public place or into the sea where it could not be said that there was in any one a real de facto possession, or a general power and intent to exclude unauthorised interference.

Bridges v. Hawkesworth (1) really stands by itself and on its own special grounds, and, standing on its own grounds, I think the decision was perfectly right. There a person had dropped a bundle of bank notes in a public shop, public, that is to say, in the sense that it was open to the public. A customer came in and picked up the bundle of notes and showed it to the shopman, and afterwards gave it to the shopkeeper in order that he might advertise it. The owner was not found, and the shopkeeper afterwards refused to give up the notes to the customer who had found them. The customer then brought an action against the shopkeeper for the notes, and it was held that he was justified in demanding the notes, and the true ground of that decision is stated by PATTESON, J., where he says (21 L.J.Q.B. at p. 78):

"The notes never were in the custody of the defendant, nor within the protection of his house before they were found."

The general principle within which the case falls seems to me to be that where there is possession of a house or land, with a manifest intention to exercise control over it, and the things in or upon it, and with control over that particular locus in quo, then if something is found on it by a person who is either a stranger or a servant, the presumption is that the possession of the thing so found is in the owner of that locus in quo. For these reasons I think judgment must be for the plaintiffs.

WILLS, J.—I agree entirely with the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, and I only wish to add that a decision to the contrary effect would, as it seems to me, be a great encouragement to dishonesty.

Conversion—Waiver of right of action—Conversion by two persons—Action against one settled by payment to owner of part of proceeds of sale—Right of owner to proceed against other tortfeasor.

If the owner of goods which have been converted by two persons agrees to stay the action against one of the wrongdoers in consideration of a sum of money, part of the proceeds of the sale of the goods, without prejudice to his claim against the other wrongdoer, he does not thereby waive the tort and is not prevented from suing the other wrongdoer.

The plaintiff's servant, without his authority, wrongfully sold his goods to the defendant and kept the proceeds. The defendant knew that the servant was dealing with the goods in an improper manner. When the plaintiff discovered the conversion of his goods it was found that the servant had £1,500 to his credit at a bank. The plaintiff brought an action against the servant and the bank claiming, as against the servant, damages for conversion, and, alternatively, the sum of £1,500 as money had and received to his use, and against the servant and the bank an injunction restraining any dealing with the money, alleging that it was part of the proceeds of the conversion. The plaintiff obtained an interlocutory injunction in the terms claimed, but the action was stayed by consent on the terms that £1,125 of the £1,500 should be paid to the plaintiff in satisfaction of all claims against the servant, but without prejudice to his claim against the defendant. After the injunction was obtained, but before the first action was settled, the plaintiff commenced the present action against the defendant claiming damages for conversion. The defendant contended that the plaintiff, with full knowledge of the facts, had ratified the servant's sale of the goods and had thereby waived the tort and was precluded from suing him for conversion.

Held: the plaintiff never intended to forgo his claim against the defendant and had accepted the sum of money without prejudice to that claim; he had, therefore, not elected to waive the tort and was not estopped from suing the defendant.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of LAWRENCE, J., after the trial of the action with a jury.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendant £5,000 damages for conversion of a large quantity of sawdust belonging to the plaintiff. The plaintiff carried on business as a dyer of furskins. In the process of cleaning the skins a large quantity of sawdust was used. The sawdust was used several times, and, if properly and thoroughly used, became so impregnated with dye as to become of little value. The plaintiff had, for many years, in his employ a man named Soltau. It was part of Soltau's duty to see to the sending away of the waste sawdust, to make all arrangements therefor, to give directions as to the loading of the vans which removed the waste sawdust, and to see that no sawdust was so removed which had not been thoroughly used. The waste sawdust was for some years removed by the defendant Reed, and the plaintiff was unable to make any arrangement for payment for this sawdust. Soltau had no authority to sell or receive payment for any sawdust, and the plaintiff believed that no payment was made by Reed for any sawdust. In February, 1898, the plaintiff discovered that for some years Soltau had been selling to Reed large quantities of sawdust, some of which had not been used at all, and some of which had been only partially used, and that Soltau had been paid by Reed, by cheques, a sum amounting to upwards of £1,500 for this sawdust. These cheques were paid by Soltau into his own account at the Birkbeck Bank, and on Feb. 18 there was a sum of £1,500 standing to the credit of Soltau at that bank. On Feb. 5, 1898, the plaintiff caused Soltau to be arrested, and charged him with the theft of sawdust; and on Feb. 17 preferred further charges of embezzlement against him.

On Feb. 19, 1898, the plaintiff commenced an action against Soltau and the Birkbeck Bank. The indorsement of the writ was as follows :

"The plaintiff's claim is for (1) Damages from the said defendant Henry Soltau for that he in the years 1891 to 1898 inclusive converted to his own use and wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of the use and possession of a large number of bags of sawdust belonging to the said plaintiff which the said defendant Henry Soltau wrongfully sold during the said period for sums amounting to upwards of £1,500; (2) alternatively to the claim in paragraph (1), payment by the defendant Soltau to the plaintiff of the sum of £1,500 and whatever other sum or sums may be found to be due from the defendant Henry Soltau to the said plaintiff as money had and received by the said defendant Henry Soltau for the said plaintiff's use being the proceeds of the sale by the said defendant Henry Soltau of the said sawdust belonging to the said plaintiff and not accounted for by the said defendant Henry Soltau to the said plaintiff; (3) payment and transfer by the defendant bank to the said plaintiff of a sum of £1,500 now standing in their books to the account and credit of the said defendant Henry Soltau and any interest thereon; (4) an injunction to restrain until trial of this action or further order the said defendant Henry Soltau, his servants and agents, from in any way charging, incumbering, disposing of, drawing out, or otherwise dealing with the said sum of £1,500 or any part thereof and from receiving any interest due or to accrue due on the same or any part thereof, and to likewise restrain the defendant bank from parting with out of their custody or in anywise dealing with the said sum of £1,500 or any part thereof and any interest thereon."

On Feb. 19, 1898, on the application of the plaintiff, an order was made at chambers restraining the defendant Soltau and the defendant bank, until Feb. 23 or further order, from in anywise dealing with the sum of £1,500 standing in the books of the bank to the account and credit of the defendant Soltau or any part thereto or any interest thereon. On Feb. 23 an order was made continuing the injunction against the bank until the trial of the action; and on Mar. 8 a similar order was made with regard to the injunction against Soltau. In an affidavit in support of the application for the injunction the plaintiff verified the facts as above stated, and alleged that the £1,500 standing to the credit of Soltau at the Birkbeck Bank was part of the proceeds of the sale of the sawdust. On Mar. 1, 1898, Soltau was convicted of larceny of the sawdust.

On April 22, 1898, the plaintiff commenced the present action against Reed claiming £5,000 damages for conversion of the sawdust. Upon June 3, 1898, the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the solicitors of Soltau saying that, on behalf of their client, they agreed, in consideration of Soltau consenting to an application by the plaintiff for an order directing payment to him of the sum of £1,125 (part of the sum of £1,500) standing in the hands of the Birkbeck Bank, in respect of the sawdust (of the value of £5,000) claimed by the plaintiff in the action and of his costs, not to proceed further in respect of the said sawdust against Soltau personally and to stay all proceedings in the action, and that they would also agree on behalf of the plaintiff to an order directing payment to Soltau of the sum of £375, the balance of the said sum of £1,500. This letter concluded as follows :

"This agreement is without prejudice to our client's claim against Mr. James Reed and any other person or persons in respect of the said sawdust or otherwise in relation thereto."

A settlement was arrived at upon the terms of that letter, and on June 10, 1898, an order was made by consent, in the action against Soltau and the bank, by which it was ordered that the bank should out of the sum of £1,500 and the interest thereon pay to the plaintiff the sum of £1,125 together with the interest thereon since Feb. 19, 1898, the same being accepted by the plaintiff in full settlement of all claims, costs, and damages in whatever respect arising against the defendant Soltau, and that the balance—viz., £375—together with the interest thereon should be paid to the solicitors of Soltau; and it was further ordered that the injunctions should be dissolved upon such payment.

The present action was tried in November, 1898, before LAWRENCE, J., with a jury, when the jury found that the defendant knew that Soltau was dealing with the sawdust in an improper manner. Upon further consideration, the defendant contended that the plaintiff had, with full knowledge of the facts, ratified Soltau's sale of the sawdust and waived the tort, and was precluded from suing the defendant for conversion. The learned judge gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff for damages to be assessed by an official referee, the amount received from Soltau in the previous action to be deducted from the amount of damages. The defendant appealed.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., Gill, Q.C., and Galbraith for the plaintiff were not called on to argue.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—This was an action of trover and conversion against the defendant, which was tried before LAWRENCE, J., with a jury. One question only was left to the jury—viz., whether the defendant had received the goods of the plaintiff knowing them to have been stolen. The jury found that the defendant knew that the goods were being improperly dealt with by the plaintiff's servant. That was the only question of fact left to the jury. I assume that it is for the court to draw any other inference which may be necessary from the facts and circumstances of the case. The question which has been argued on this appeal is whether the plaintiff was estopped from maintaining this action of trover and conversion by reason of his having elected, by his dealings with his servant, to affirm the authority of his servant to deal with the goods. It is, I think, quite clear that the plaintiff never did in fact intend to forego his claim against the present defendant for conversion. The plaintiff received only £1,125 from his servant, and he accepted that sum without prejudice to his claim against the present defendant. The question therefore is substantially whether the circumstances of this case are such as to require the court to hold that the plaintiff so acted as to be estopped from claiming against the defendant for trover and conversion.

The plaintiff's servant Soltau was convicted of larceny on Mar. 1, 1898. Before this the plaintiff had commenced an action against Soltau and the Birkbeck Bank, claiming damages for conversion and alternatively making a claim for money had and received. That action never proceeded further than the writ. Considering the verdict of the jury in the present case, that the defendant knew that Soltau was improperly dealing with the sawdust, it is clear that he was a party to torts against the plaintiff for which he was separately liable, though in a certain sense they were joint acts of tort. In these circumstances there was an application for an interim injunction made by the plaintiff, in the action against Soltau, in which he made an affidavit. In that affidavit the plaintiff said that the money standing to the credit of Soltau at the bank was part of the proceeds of the sale of his sawdust. An interim injunction, restraining any dealing with the money at the bank until the trial of the action, was obtained. Doubtless, if the plaintiff had gone to trial in that action and taken a judgment for money had and received to his use, that would have been a conclusive election by him to waive the tort; but he did not do so. In April, 1898, he brought the present action against the defendant for conversion, claiming from him the true value of the sawdust. Then an arrangement was made by the plaintiff with Soltau that £1,125 should be paid out of the money in the bank to the plaintiff, and that all claims against Soltau should be discharged, but that the plaintiff's claim against the present defendant should be preserved. This action was tried in November, 1898. The jury gave a verdict upon one question of fact only; all other inferences of fact being left to the court.

Are we obliged to say, contrary to the real intention of the plaintiff, that he so acted as to conclusively elect to ratify the sale of his goods by Soltau, and to waive the tort? In my opinion, we are not bound to so hold. I agree that the claim which was made in the action against Soltau, and the proceedings taken in that action, do raise a difficulty, but not an insuperable one. I think that the cases do not compel us to come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is estopped from claiming against the present defendant for conversion. Morris v. Robinson (1) is important in the consideration of the question. There the master of a ship, which was injured by perils of the sea, put in to Mauritius and there abandoned the ship and cargo, which were sold under an order of the court and the proceeds paid into court. The owners of the cargo applied for payment out of court to them of the proceeds of sale, but the money was not paid out to them. It was held that this application did not prevent the owners of the cargo from suing the purchasers upon the ground that the sale was wrongful. That case seems to establish the proposition that an application made to the court for payment of the proceeds of sale of the goods is not conclusive proof of an election to treat the sale as authorised. That seems to me to answer the contention of the defendant in the present case. Indeed, in this case, no application of that kind was made. I think that Burn v. Morris (2) is in favour of the plaintiff. In that case it was held that the plaintiff could sue the defendant for conversion of a lost bank-note, although part of the proceeds had been paid to him by the defendant, acceptance of part of the proceeds not being a waiver of the tort. Further, the result of the proceedings against Soltau went to the relief of the present defendant, which is a not unimportant consideration. I arrive, therefore, at the conclusion that there are no circumstances in this case which compel the court to hold that there was a conclusive election by the plaintiff to ratify the acts of Soltau. The appeal therefore fails, and must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff brought this action to recover £5,000 damages for conversion of his goods by the defendant. The jury found that the defendant knew that the plaintiff's servant, Soltau, was dealing with the goods improperly. The defendant contends that the plaintiff cannot sue him in trover, because he took proceedings against Soltau and waived the tort and affirmed the sale of his goods. A

There are authorities which show that, when an action has been brought to recover the proceeds of a sale as money had and received to the plaintiff's use, the plaintiff thereby affirms the sale and cannot afterwards sue for tort, having made an unequivocal election to affirm to the sale. Those cases were rightly decided and are binding upon us. What happened in the present case? The plaintiff sued Soltau, claiming in the alternative damages for conversion and money had and received. We cannot say that this was an election to waive the tort and affirm the sale. The plaintiff, in the action against Soltau, applied for and obtained an interim injunction to prevent Soltau dealing with the money standing to his credit at the bank. The object of that application was clear; it was to save some of the proceeds of the theft. In Smith v. Baker (3), BOVILL, C.J., says (L.R. 8 C.P. at pp. 355, 356): B C

"The law is clear that a person who is entitled to complain of a conversion of his property, but who prefers to waive the tort, may do so and bring his action for money had and received for the proceeds of goods wrongfully sold. . . . But if an action for money had and received is so brought, that is in point of law a conclusive election to waive the tort, and so the commencement of an action of trespass or trover is a conclusive election the other way. . . . But there is another class of cases in which an act is of an ambiguous character, and may or may not be done with the intention of adopting and affirming the wrongful act. In such cases the question whether the tort has been waived becomes rather a matter of fact than of law." D E

If a claim is made both for conversion and for money had and received, where is the conclusive election to waive the tort? I am clearly of opinion that in this case there was not, as a matter of fact, any election by the plaintiff to waive the tort. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. The key to this case is the fact that there is no judgment of the court upon which the defendant can rely as an answer to the present action, but only a consent order to the effect that the action against Soltau should be stayed, upon terms, without prejudice to the plaintiff's claim against the present defendant. If there had been a judgment in trover in the other action, and an assessment of damages, I agree that the defendant would be entitled to succeed in this action. There was not, however, any judgment in trover in the other action. Again, if judgment had been recovered, in the other action, for money had and received to the plaintiff's use, in the same way the plaintiff would have conclusively elected to waive his right to proceed in tort, and that waiver would enure for the benefit of those liable with the defendant against whom that judgment had been obtained. But this case is quite different. Although the order in the action against Soltau was drawn up as an order of the court, yet it was only a consent order, and the correspondence shows that, at the very time, the defendant was reserving his rights against the present defendant. I wish to point out that, where an action is brought for damages for a tort, the right of the plaintiff to reserve his rights against another wrongdoer is larger than in cases of claims upon a contract. If the plaintiff chooses to compromise his claim, even in an action upon a contract, and reserves his rights against a joint debtor, that prevents the latter from setting up the compromise as an answer to a claim against himself. The defendant falsely and maliciously represented to a wife that her husband had been seriously injured and was in great danger, the shock caused by that statement brought on dangerous and serious illness, and the husband was put to expense for medical assistance. In an action by the husband and wife for damages for mental anguish, injury to health, and out-of-pocket expenses,

Held: as the defendant had wilfully and unjustifiably done an act calculated to cause physical harm to the plaintiff, an intention to produce such a result must be imputed to him; the damages claimed were not too remote; and, therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed.

Further Consideration as to the legal liability of the defendant for damages in an action tried by WRIGHT, J., with a common jury.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs against the defendant to recover damages for false, fraudulent, and malicious representation. The paragraphs of the statement of claim, so far as they relate to the present point, were as follows:

“(2) On April 9, 1896, the plaintiff Thomas Andrew Wilkinson went by train to see the Harlow races, and in the evening of the same day, the plaintiff Thomas Andrew Wilkinson being then absent, the defendant entered the public-house at 25, St. Paul’s Road and then and there falsely, fraudulently, and maliciously told the plaintiff Lavinia Elizabeth Wilkinson that he had received a message from her said husband that the said Thomas Andrew Wilkinson had had a smash up and was at that time lying at the Elms public-house, Leytonstone, and that the said Thomas Andrew Wilkinson had desired the said defendant to request the plaintiff Lavinia Elizabeth Wilkinson to go down at once with a cab and fetch some pillows to take her husband home. The said defendant further falsely and maliciously said to the plaintiff Lavinia Elizabeth Wilkinson that her said husband had returned from the races with some friends in a waggonette and was seriously injured, all of which statements the said defendant well knew to be false and fraudulent and spoken by him the said defendant with intent maliciously to and well knowing that he would thereby aggrieve, injure, and annoy the said plaintiff Lavinia Elizabeth Wilkinson. (3) By reason of the said false, fraudulent, and malicious statements of the said defendant, the plaintiff Lavinia Elizabeth Wilkinson suffered great mental anguish, and was made seriously ill, and her hair was turned white and her life was for some time in great danger, and the plaintiff Thomas Andrew Wilkinson, by reason of the grievances herein complained of, has suffered distress of mind on account of his said wife’s condition, and incurred considerable expense for medical attendance on his said wife and otherwise in respect of her said illness, and has lost the services of his said wife, and has been otherwise damnified.”

The plaintiffs were allowed to amend their claim by adding the expenses directly caused by the false statement, which were the railway fares of the men sent to fetch the husband home. The learned judge left the following questions to the jury: (i) Did the defendant speak the words alleged or to that effect? Answer, Yes. (ii) Did he mean them to be heard and acted upon, or say them in such a way as if so meant? Yes. (iii) Were they believed and acted upon? Yes. (iv) Were they false to his knowledge? Yes. (v) What were the damages with regard to the journey? 1s. 10½d. (vi) Was the illness the effect of shock from the words? Yes. (vii) What were the damages caused by the illness of the female plaintiff? £100.

May 8, 1897. WRIGHT, J., read a judgment in which he referred to the plaintiffs’ allegations, in the statement of claim, and continued: The defendant, in the execution of what he seems to have regarded as a practical joke, represented to the female plaintiff that he was charged by her husband with a message to her to the effect that the husband had been smashed up in an accident, and was lying at the Elms public-house at Leytonstone with both legs broken, and that she was to go at once in a cab to fetch him home. All this was false. The effect of this statement on the female plaintiff was a violent shock to the nervous system producing vomiting and other more serious and permanent physical consequences, at one time threatening her reason and entailing weeks of suffering and incapacity to her as well as expense to her husband for medical treatment of her. These consequences were not in any way the result of previous ill-health or weakness of constitution, nor was there any evidence of predisposition to nervous shock or of any other idiosyncrasy. In addition to these matters of substance there is a small claim for 1s. 10½d. for the cost of railway fares of persons sent by the female plaintiff to Leytonstone in obedience to the pretended message. As to this 1s. 10½d. expended in railway fares on the faith of the defendant’s statement, it is clearly within the scope of the decision in Pasley v. Freeman (1). It was a misrepresentation intended to be acted on to the damage of the plaintiff.

The real question is as to the £100, the greatest part of which is given as compensation for the female plaintiff's illness and suffering. It was argued for her that she is entitled to recover this as being damage caused by fraud, and, therefore, within the doctrine established by Pasley v. Freeman (1) and Langridge v. Levy (2). I am not sure that this would not be an extension of that doctrine, the real ground of which appears to be that a person who makes a false statement, intending it to be acted on, must make good the damage naturally resulting from its being acted on. Here is no injuria of that kind. I think, however, that the verdict may be supported on another ground. The defendant has, as I assume for the moment, wilfully done an act calculated to cause physical harm to the female plaintiff, i.e., to infringe her legal right to personal safety, and has thereby in fact caused physical harm to her. That proposition, without more, appears to me to state a good cause of action, there being no justification alleged for the act. This wilful injuria is in law malicious, although no malicious purpose to cause the harm which was caused, nor any motive of spite, is imputed to the defendant.

It remains to consider whether the assumptions involved in the proposition are made out. One question is whether the defendant's act was so plainly calculated to produce some effect of the kind which was produced, that an intention to produce it ought to be imputed to the defendant regard being had to the fact that the effect was produced on a person proved to be in an ordinary state of health and mind. I think that it was. It is difficult to imagine that such a statement, made suddenly and with apparent seriousness, could fail to produce grave effects under the circumstances upon any but an exceptionally indifferent person, and therefore an intention to produce such an effect must be imputed, and it is no answer in law to say that more harm was done than was anticipated, for that is commonly the case with all wrongs. The other question is whether the effect was, to use the ordinary phrase, too remote to be in law regarded as a consequence for which the defendant is answerable. Apart from authority I should give the same answer, and on the same grounds, as to the last question, and say that it was not too remote. Whether, as the majority of the Lords thought in Lynch v. Knight (3), the criterion is in asking what would be the natural effect on reasonable persons, or whether, as LORD WENSLEYDALE thought, the possible infirmities of human nature ought to be recognised, it seems to me that the connection between the cause and the effect is sufficiently close and complete.

It is, however, necessary to consider two authorities which are supposed to have laid down that illness through mental shock is a too remote or unnatural consequence of an injuria to entitle the plaintiffs to recover in a case where damage is a necessary part of the cause of action. One is Victorian Railways Comrs. v. Coultas (4), where it was held in the Privy Council that illness which was the effect of shock caused by fright was too remote a consequence of a negligent act which caused the fright, there being no physical harm immediately caused. That decision was treated in the Court of Appeal in Pugh v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Rail. Co. (5) as open to question. It is inconsistent with an earlier decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland (Bell v. Great Northern Rail. Co. of Ireland (6)), where the Irish Exchequer Division declined to follow Victorian Railways Comrs. v. Coultas (4), and it has been disapproved in the Supreme Court of New York (see POLLOCK ON TORTS (4th Edn.), p. 47 (n.)). Nor is it altogether in point, for there was not in that case any element of wilful wrong, nor was perhaps the illness so direct and natural a consequence of the defendant's conduct, as in this case.

On these grounds it seems to me that Victorian Railways Comrs. v. Coultas (4) is not an authority on which this case ought to be decided.

A more serious difficulty is the decision in Allsop v. Allsop (7), which was approved in the House of Lords in Lynch v. Knight (3). In that case it was held by POLLOCK, C.B., MARTIN, BRAMWELL, and WILDE, BB., that illness caused by a slanderous imputation of unchastity in the case of a married woman did not constitute such special damage as would sustain an action for such a slander. That case, however, appears to have been decided on the grounds that, in all the innumerable actions for slander which had occurred, there were no precedents for alleging illness to be sufficient special damage; and that it would be an evil consequence to treat it as sufficient, because such a rule might lead to an infinity of trumpery or groundless actions. Neither of these reasons is applicable to the present case, nor could such a rule be adopted as of general application without results which it would be difficult or impossible to defend. Suppose that a person is in a precarious and dangerous condition, and another person falsely tells him that his physician has said that he has but a day to live. In such a case, if death ensued from the shock caused by the false statement, I cannot doubt that the case might be one of criminal homicide; or that, if a serious aggravation of illness ensued, damages might be recovered. I think, however, that it must be admitted that the present case is without precedent. Some English decisions are cited in MR. BEVEN'S book ON NEGLIGENCE as inconsistent with the decision in Victorian Railways Comrs. v. Coultas (4), such as Jones v. Boyce (8), Wilkins v. Day (9), Harris v. Mobbs (10). But I think that those cases are to be explained on a different ground, namely, that the damage which immediately resulted from the act of the passenger or the horse was really the result not of that act, but of a fright which rendered that act involuntary, and which, therefore, ought to be regarded as itself the direct and immediate cause of the damage.

In Smith v. Johnson & Co. (11), decided in January, 1897, BRUCE, J., and I held that, where a man was killed in the sight of the plaintiff by the defendant's negligence, and the plaintiff became ill, not from the shock from fear of harm to himself but from the shock of seeing another person killed, this harm was too remote a consequence of the negligence. But that was a very different case from the present one.

Cancellation of charterparty—Commission due to broker.*

The plaintiff, acting as broker for shipowners, obtained a time charterparty for their ship on terms of being paid a commission on all hire earned. During the currency of the charterparty litigation arose between the shipowners and the charterers as to the fitness of the ship for the purposes for which she was chartered, which resulted in the cancellation of the charterparty, there being no wilful act or default on the part of the shipowners in bringing about this result.

Held: there being no implied term in the charterparty that the plaintiff was to receive commission during the whole of the currency of the charterparty, he was only entitled to commission on the hire actually earned.

Appeal from a decision of BIGHAM, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

By a charterparty dated Sept. 14, 1896, obtained for the defendants through the intervention of the plaintiff, and made between the defendants as owners and the Jamaica Fruit Importing and Trading Company of London as charterers, the steamship Elderslie was let to the charterers for the term of twelve calendar months, she being tight, staunch, and strong, and in every way fitted for the service, the charterers to pay for the use and hire of the vessel at the rate of £1,050 per month. It contained provisions for the ceasing of payment of hire in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery, etc., and the owners agreed to place at charterers' disposal in good working order the refrigerating engine and plant then on board for the carrying of fruit. The charterparty also provided for the payment of one-third only of the agreed hire in the event of delay under certain circumstances. Should the vessel be lost, the hire was to cease on the day of such loss. The printed form of charterparty which was used also contained this clause:

"A commission of 5 per cent. on the estimated gross amount of freight or hire due on the signment hereof, ship lost or not lost, to John White," but the latter words of this clause were struck out and other words inserted in writing, so that, in the charterparty as signed by the defendants, this clause ran, "A commission of 5 per cent. on all hire earned to be paid to John White." The plaintiff received commission under this agreement on the hire earned during the first two months of the charterparty. In the third month of the charterparty, disputes arose between the owners and the charterers with reference to the fitness of the ship for the purposes for which she had been chartered, and litigation commenced between them. On the trial of that action, judgment was entered by consent for the charterers on terms, one of which was that the charterparty should be cancelled. The plaintiff then commenced the present action claiming damages for breach of contract in respect of loss of commission for hire during the last ten months of the charterparty. BIGHAM, J., gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

Lawson Walton, Q.C. (J. Eldon Bankes with him), for the plaintiff.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Leck, for the defendants, were not called on to argue.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I entirely agree with the decision of BIGHAM, J. The charterparty, on the terms of which the plaintiff bases his claim for commission, was drawn up on one of the printed forms used by him which all contain a clause that a commission of 5 per cent. on the estimated gross amount of freight or hire should be paid to John White on the signing of the agreement. That clause is an absolute contract for the payment of that amount of commission. It is clear that the owners, who are now being sued, objected to signing a charterparty with such a clause, because the latter part of it was struck out, and instead of it words were inserted by which it was agreed that a commission of 5 per cent. on all hire earned should be paid to the plaintiff. That was clearly put in as a limitation of the obligation of the defendants with regard to the commission to be paid.

I cannot do better than refer to the judgment delivered by BIGHAM, J. He points out that the plaintiff cannot claim commission on hire actually earned, except in respect of the first two or three months use of the ship under the charterparty, and that claim is admitted by the defendants. He then refers to the argument put forward on behalf of the plaintiff that there was an implied term in the agreement that the defendants would do nothing to prevent commission becoming payable to the plaintiff, that is to say, that they would keep the charterparty alive for the twelve months, and do all things necessary to earn freight under it. The learned judge observes that the plaintiff was driven to contend that the hire was not earned by reason of a breach of the charter by the defendants:

“The question, therefore, comes round to this: Was there any such breach as to entitle the plaintiff to claim in respect of it? I think not. I have to gather the intention of the parties from the language of the clause and the surrounding circumstances. I think the intention of both parties was that commission should only be payable upon hire actually earned, and that all risks which might interfere with the earning of hire, short possibly of the defendants' own wilful default, should be shared by them both; that is to say, if from causes such as brought this charter to an end no hire was earned, the plaintiff was to be paid no commission. The commission clause seems to me to have been expressed in its present terms for the very purpose of preventing disputes of the kind which have arisen in this case.”

I entirely agree with that. There is no evidence before us that the cancellation of the charterparty was brought about by any wilful acts of the defendants such as are the subject of the cases that have been cited.

Taking the meaning of this agreement to be that which I hold it is, none of the cases cited has any application to the case now before us, and, therefore, I shall not discuss them. We know that there was a dispute between the parties to the charterparty followed by litigation, at the end of which they came to an agreement that the charterparty should be cancelled. That does not constitute a wilful act on the part of the defendants within the meaning of the cases cited. LORD BOWEN has admirably expressed the principle to be applied in such cases in The Moorcock (1) and in Hamlyn & Co. v. Wood & Co. (2). In the latter case, he said ([1891] 2 Q.B. at p. 493):

“In some cases it may be necessary, in order to give effect to a transaction, that the law should imply a stipulation not wilfully to put an end to a business, although the parties had not made such a stipulation in terms. The question is whether such an implication is necessary here, or whether without such an implication the contract may not have a very reasonable effect.”

Those words seem to me very applicable to the present case.

On the true construction of this contract, I think that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover commission in respect of the hire which was never earned under the charterparty, and that the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I think that BIGHAM, J., based his judgment on true grounds. The case lies in a very small compass. We are entitled to take note of the clause contained in the printed form which was struck

A out and replaced in writing by the one which is now sued on. As finally settled, this clause provides for the payment to the plaintiff of a commission of 5 per cent. "on all hire earned." I see no difficulty about the meaning of those words. The commission is to be paid on what the defendants earn under the charterparty. But the plaintiff is not satisfied with that. He seeks to import into the matter an implied obligation of some kind lying on the defendants. What that implied obligation is counsel for the plaintiff had some difficulty in expressing. But in the result it came to this, that the defendants were bound not to put an end to the charterparty under any circumstances whatever. The proposition that such an implication is to be made in this contract cannot, I think, be maintained. What happened was that litigation arose between the defendants and the charterers with regard to the fitness of the ship for the purposes for which she was to be employed under the charterparty, and this litigation resulted in an arrangement under which the charterparty was cancelled. It would be wholly unreasonable to imply in the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants any term which would make the defendants liable, under those circumstances, to pay the plaintiff the commission which he now claims. But, after all, the real question before us is merely a question of construction, and, on the express terms of this D agreement, I think that the plaintiff must fail.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree. I only wish to add that I do not think that there is anything in our present decision which at all negatives the possibility of the existence of an implied term in this contract which might be of such a character as to render it a breach of contract for the defendants to E repudiate the charterparty, and wilfully refuse to carry it out. The term which we are invited to imply here is of a much wider character. It is that the defendants undertook to the plaintiff that they would not do or omit to do anything to prevent the performing of the charterparty, and would not, in the course of carrying out the charterparty, be guilty of any breach of it. I not only find nothing in the present case to warrant our saying that there is here any necessary implication F of such a term, but I will add this that, in my judgment, the provisions of this charterparty render it absolutely impossible that we should hold that any such term could be implied.

Charity—Religion—Devise of land upon trust for “furtherance of Conservative principles and religious and mental improvement.”

By his will a testator devised to the vicar for the time being of a named parish a building known as the “Conservative Club and Village Reading Room” to be maintained “for the furtherance of Conservative principles and religious and mental improvement, and to be kept free from intoxicants and dancing.” He also devised to such vicar “one moiety of the income [of a piece of freehold land] . . . to be used for the maintenance of the aforesaid club and reading-room.”

Held: on the true construction of the will the first gift was either for the furtherance of Conservative principles so far as they were consistent with religious and mental improvement, or it was a gift for the furtherance of religious and mental improvement in connection with the advancement of Conservative principles; in either case it was a gift for the furtherance of religious and mental improvement and so a good charitable gift; the second gift must be read in conjunction with the first gift, and, therefore, was also a good charitable gift.

Originating Summons taken out by the trustees of the will of the Rev. J. H. Scowcroft, late vicar of Bishop's Itchington, in the county of Warwick, to determine the validity of certain charitable gifts contained in the will.

The testator by his will dated Feb. 26, 1897, devised to the vicar for the time being (his successor) and his successors, vicars of Bishop's Itchington, a building known as "The Conservative Club and Village Reading Room" in the said village, to be maintained

"for the furtherance of Conservative principles and religious and mental improvement and to be kept free from all intoxicants and dancing."

And he also thereby devised to such vicar and his successors a certain piece of freehold land situate in the village

"one moiety of the income thereof to be used by the said vicar for and towards church expenses (especially the organist's salary) the other moiety to be used for the maintenance of the aforesaid club and reading-room."

In administering the estate and executing the trusts of the will the question was raised whether the two gifts of the building and the land were or were not good and valid charitable gifts, and an originating summons was taken out by the trustees for the determination of that question.

It appeared that the testator had purchased the land on which the club now stood in 1895, and had erected the building in 1896, and that down to the date of his death in February, 1897, the building had been used as a club-room for persons whose political opinions were Conservative to meet in, and also as a reading-room for persons residing in the parish who professed to belong to the Conservative party. It was not disputed that the gift for church expenses was valid.

Stallard for the summons.

Clode for the Vicar of Bishop's Itchington.

STIRLING, J., stated the facts and continued:—The first question is, what is the true construction of the gift. It was said that it was a gift of a building either for the furtherance of Conservative principles or for the furtherance of religious and mental improvement, and that a gift for the furtherance of Conservative principles was not a good charitable gift. The gift is for the furtherance of Conservative principles and religious and mental improvement in combination. Therefore, it is either a gift for the furtherance of Conservative principles, so far as they were consistent with religious and mental improvement, or it is a gift for the furtherance of religious and mental improvement in connection with the advancement of Conservative principles; and in either case it is a gift for the furtherance of religious and mental improvement. That construction is borne out by the direction in the will which follows the gift, namely, that the building is "to be kept free from intoxicants and dancing." In my opinion, therefore, the first is a good charitable gift. With regard to the gift of the land, one moiety of the income of which is "to be used for the maintenance of the aforesaid club and reading-room," it was said that that was for the maintenance of the club and reading-room as it existed at the date of the testator's death. In my view that it not so. It must be taken in connection with the former gift, and accordingly both gifts are in my opinion good charitable gifts.

The defendant was the owner of a piece of waste land adjoining a highway and of a wooden fence which separated the land from the highway. Children were accustomed to play on the waste land, and the plaintiff, a child of four, climbed on the fence to watch the children at play on the other side. The fence broke, and he fell and was injured. The fence was in such a defective condition as to amount to a nuisance on the highway.

Held: the defendant should have anticipated that an accident to a child was likely to result from the condition of the fence, and, therefore, he was liable in respect of the plaintiff's injuries.

Per VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.: When considering whether the nuisance was the cause of the accident it is a good test to see whether what the child did was something which ought to have been present to the mind of the defendant as a possible and probable result of leaving the fence in a dangerous condition. The highway is for the use not only of adults but of children also, and if a man leaves a nuisance close to a highway, it is extremely likely to cause injury to persons on the highway.

Application by the plaintiff for judgment or for a new trial on appeal from the verdict and judgment at the trial before RIDLEY, J., with a jury, in Middlesex.

The plaintiff was a boy four years of age, suing by his father as his next friend, who brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries. The defendant was the owner of a piece of waste land adjoining South Street, Wandsworth, which was separated from the highway by a wooden fence which belonged to the defendant. It was proved at the trial that children were accustomed to play upon the piece of waste land; that the fence was in a rotten condition; and that the plaintiff had put his feet upon the fence when a large part of it fell down upon him and severely injured him. Presumably the child was climbing upon the fence for the purpose of looking at the children who were playing upon the piece of waste land. The jury returned a verdict as follows:

"We find that the fence was very defective, but actually fell through the child standing wholly or partly on the fence, not for the purpose of climbing over. If the plaintiff is entitled to recover, we assess the damages at £45."

RIDLEY, J., after argument entered judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

Chamier for the appellant.

A. J. David for the respondent.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff asking that the verdict and judgment shall be entered for him in an action tried before RIDLEY, J., with a jury. It seems to me that the real question in this case was not specifically put to the jury at the trial.

The case was as follows. The defendant was the owner of a fence by the side of a highway. The evidence was overwhelming that this fence was rotten, and the jury have really so found. The plaintiff, a child four years of age, was using the highway. There was evidence that upon the land on the other side of the fence children were accustomed to play, and there was evidence that the plaintiff put his feet upon the fence for the purpose of looking at the children who were playing on the other side. The fence broke and fell upon the plaintiff and injured him, and the jury have estimated the damages at £45. RIDLEY, J., after argument, entered judgment for the defendant. I cannot think that he was right in so doing. First of all, there was a rotten fence close to the highway, which was obviously a nuisance to the highway. If a person leaned against the fence and it broke, and he was injured, it would obviously be an injury caused by a nuisance. This is a stronger case. The injury has been caused to a person lawfully using the highway, and doing precisely that which was pointed out to be probable by LORD DENMAN, C.J., in Lynch v. Nurdin (1). He there says (1 Q.B. at p. 88):

"But the question remains, can the plaintiff then, consistently with the authorities, maintain his action, having been at least equally in fault? The answer is that, supposing that fact ascertained by the jury, but to this extent, that he merely indulged the natural instinct of a child in amusing himself with the empty cart and deserted horse, then we think that the defendant cannot be permitted to avail himself of that fact. The most blameable carelessness of his servant having tempted the child, he ought not to reproach the child with yielding to that temptation. He has been the real and only cause of the mischief. He has been deficient in ordinary care; the child, acting without prudence or thought, has however shown these qualities in as great a degree as he could be expected to possess them. His misconduct bears no proportion to that of the defendant which produced it."

That case has never been over-ruled or questioned. It was a case where a horse and cart were left unattended on a highway, and the plaintiff, a child, got into the cart to play and another child led the horse on and the plaintiff was thrown out and injured. That case seems to me to govern the present case.

There is also another case of Jewson v. Gatti (2), which is in point. There the defendant kept a cellar at the side of the highway, and when it was open he left a bar across the open part; a child who was coming along the street leant against the bar; the bar gave way and the child was injured. DAY, J., nonsuited the plaintiff, but the Court of Appeal set aside the nonsuit and ordered a new trial. LORD ESHER, M.R., there said (2 T.L.R. at p. 442):

"This was a case of premises on a highway in a street where hundreds of persons and many children were passing up and down, and the area was left unprotected without any due regard to the safety of the public, and that of itself might be sufficient to sustain a case for the plaintiff. But there was more than that, for there was painting going on in the cellar, and it must have been known that this would attract children; and then a bar was put up, ostensibly for the purpose of protection, against which children would naturally lean when looking down into the cellar where the painting was going on. That was almost an invitation, certainly an inducement, to the children to lean against the bar when looking down into the cellar."

In that case it was argued that it was the child's own fault that caused the injury, but the Court of Appeal decided otherwise.

For these reasons I think that it is the duty of this court, considering what are the real facts of the case and the finding of the jury, not to allow the expense of a new trial to be incurred, but to order judgment to be entered for the plaintiff for the amount of damages assessed by the jury. The appeal will, therefore, be allowed and judgment be entered for the plaintiff.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the argument that the child cannot recover damages because the injury arose from his own fault cannot be maintained. How is it possible to say that a matter of this kind is the child's own fault? In neither Lynch v. Nurdin (1) nor Jewson v. Gatti (2) was that argument accepted. I agree, therefore, that the appeal must be allowed and judgment be entered for the plaintiff.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. This case raises a question of principle which may occur again, and I, therefore, think it right to express what I believe to be the principle applicable in cases of this kind. This is an action in which it is alleged that injury was caused to a child by the dangerous condition in which the defendant had left his fence which adjoined a highway. The jury were not asked the specific question whether or not the fence was in such a condition as to be dangerous to persons using the highway. If, however, we consider the evidence and the finding of the jury, there can be no doubt but that the only proper conclusion to be drawn is that the fence was in such a condition that it did constitute a danger to those who were using the highway. In my opinion, the fence constituted a nuisance.

When it is established that the fence was a nuisance, that is not enough of itself to give a cause of action. It must be proved, not only that the fence was in such a condition as to be a nuisance to the highway, but also that this nuisance was the cause of the injury complained of. When it is contended on behalf of the defendant that the child ought not to have put his feet upon the fence, that is really a suggestion that the accident was not caused by the nuisance but by the conduct of the child himself, and that it is immaterial whether that conduct amounted to trespass or negligence. In my opinion, it is not true to say in this case that the accident was caused by the conduct of the child at all. The defendant was guilty of creating this nuisance. When considering whether the nuisance was the cause of the accident, it is a good test to see whether what the child did was something which ought to have been present to the mind of the defendant as a possible and probable result of leaving the fence in a dangerous condition. The highway is for the use not only of adults but of children also, and, if a man leaves a nuisance close to a highway of this kind, it is extremely likely to cause injury to persons on the highway. If that be so, it is the nuisance which causes the injury, and it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the nuisance is the cause of the injury by relying on the act of a child in touching the fence, it being an act which an adult would probably not have done. I think, therefore, that the plaintiff has established in this case that the fence was in such a condition as to be a nuisance to the highway, and that the injury was caused by the condition of the fence and not by the child's own fault. Judgment ought, therefore, to be entered for the plaintiff, and the appeal must be allowed.

To constitute desertion there must be a cessation of cohabitation and an intention on the part of the accused party to desert the other. The party who intends to bring the cohabitation to an end and whose conduct causes its termination commits the act of desertion, and that party need not necessarily be the one who leaves the matrimonial home. A wife whose husband is carrying on an adulterous intercourse with another woman, whether in the matrimonial home or not, is not bound to remain in cohabitation with the husband. In such a case the husband is deemed to intend the consequences of his action, i.e., that the wife will not live with him, and the situation is the same as if he had left the matrimonial home.

A husband carried on adulterous associations with other women while living with his wife and refused the wife's request that he should give up such associations, and as a result of his refusal the wife left the matrimonial home.

Held: he was guilty of desertion.

Petition by Ellen Millicent Ashburner Sickert for a dissolution of her marriage with Walter Richard Sickert on the ground of the latter's adultery and desertion.

The petitioner was married to the respondent, who was an artist, on June 10, 1885, and they lived together until Sept. 29, 1896. In 1895 the petitioner had a strong suspicion that the respondent was leading an improper life. In that year she found a letter to him from a woman, and he admitted two cases of adultery, one with her and one with another woman. He promised to have nothing more to do with them, and the petitioner forgave him. In May, 1896, there was a short separation between them in consequence of his conduct, but the respondent rejoined the petitioner in Switzerland. On Sept. 29, 1896, while they were at Fluelen, on the Lake of Lucerne, he made a statement to her, the substance of which was that it was no use concealing the fact that he had never been faithful to her and never could be. The petitioner said that, as long as the respondent lived that sort of life, she could not live with him, but was willing to do so if he would give it up. He declined to do so. They thereupon separated and had ever since lived apart. On Dec. 8, 1898, the petitioner wrote to the respondent as follows:

"Dear Walter,—In spite of your having told me, when we parted in Switzerland in September, 1896, that immediately after our marriage and ever since you had lived an adulterous life, and that you felt sure you could never live a different one, I have been hoping against hope that you would abandon it, but all that I have heard of you during the last two years has forced me to give up all possible hope for the future.—Yours truly, E. M. SICKERT."

To this letter the respondent replied as follows:

"My dear Nellie,—I have received your letter of December 8. It is quite true that I have not been faithful to you since our marriage, and it is equally true that during the two years since we parted I have been intimate with several women. As I told you long ago, I cannot continue a life of dissimulation. I have chosen my mode of life, and I am unable to alter it. An undertaking on my part would be misleading.—Ever your profoundly attached, WALTER SICKERT."

In May, 1899, the present suit was begun.

Bargrave Deane, Q.C., and A. Llewelyn Davies for the petitioner.

July 26, 1899. GORELL BARNES, J., read the following judgment.—The petitioner in this case prays for a dissolution of her marriage with the respondent, on the ground of his desertion and adultery. The adultery, which occurred in April, 1898, and May, 1899, was proved; but an important question is raised with

A regard to the alleged desertion. The facts appear to be these: [The learned judge then summarised the facts as set out above.] There have been a number of cases on this question of desertion, but as they were mostly undefended, and the question raised upon the facts in this case is of considerable importance, I reserved my judgment. A wife is entitled to obtain a divorce from her husband if he has been guilty of (inter alia) adultery coupled with desertion, without reasonable excuse, B for two years and upwards.

In order to constitute desertion there must be a cessation of cohabitation and an intention on the part of the accused party to desert the other. In most cases of desertion the guilty party actually leaves the other, but it is not always necessarily the guilty party who leaves the matrimonial home. In my opinion the party who intends to bring the cohabitation to an end, and whose conduct in reality causes C its termination, commits the act of desertion. There is no substantial difference between the case of a husband who intends to put an end to the state of cohabitation and does so by leaving his wife and that of a husband who, with the like intent, obliges his wife to separate from him.

The view of the law, applicable to desertion, has been taken in Dickinson v. Dickinson (1) and Koch v. Koch (2). In the first of these cases the husband brought D to the house a woman with whom he had immoral relations. The wife refused to admit her, but the husband insisted. The wife remained a short time in the house, and then told her husband that either she or the woman must leave the house. The husband told her that she might do as she liked, but that the woman would remain. The wife thereupon left and never afterwards cohabited with her husband. SIR CHARLES BUTT held that the husband was guilty of deserting his E wife. In the second case, which was heard before myself, the husband was guilty of immoral relations with a servant in the house. The husband refused to break off these relations or discharge the girl, and the wife thereupon left the house. The husband continued to live for years with the servant. I held the husband guilty of desertion.

F In these two cases the adulterous intercourse which the husband refused to put an end to was being carried on in the matrimonial home; but in the earlier case of Graves v. Graves (3), heard by LORD PENZANCE in 1864, the adulterous intercourse, though carried on for a time in the house occupied by the petitioner and respondent, was not discovered by the petitioner until after the parties had separated. The report in the LAW JOURNAL is fuller than the report in 3 Sw. & Tr. 350, and the G headnote is as follows (33 L.J.P.M. & A. 66):

H "Shortly after a marriage the husband, with the intention of bringing about a separation, so treated his wife as to compel her to leave him. She subsequently made several offers to return, but he refused to receive her. She continued willing to return until she found that he was carrying on an adulterous intercourse which had subsisted since the marriage. She then refused to return exception upon condition that such intercourse should cease. HELD, that such conduct before the wife became aware of his adultery amounted to desertion, and that such desertion was not put an end to by her unwillingness to return while the adultery continued."

I The present case is scarcely distinguishable from Pizzala v. Pizzala (4). There the husband was carrying on an adulterous intercourse with another woman, but not in the matrimonial home, and refused to break it off, although his wife told him that unless he did so she must leave him. The wife then left him, and he continued to live with the woman for over two years. The President held the husband guilty of desertion.

These cases all appear to me to have been decided in accordance with the principles shortly stated above, and no distinction has been made whether the adulterous intercourse was carried on in the matrimonial home or elsewhere. A wife whose husband is carrying on an adulterous intercourse with another woman or other women is not bound to remain in cohabitation with him. She can at once obtain a judicial separation. She may, however, be willing to remain with her husband provided he will give up the connection complained of, and if he refuses to do so, a wife with any self-respect has only one course to take—that is, to withdraw from cohabitation. The husband in such a case must be taken to intend the consequences of his action—that is to say, his wife shall not live with him. The situation then produced is just the same as if the guilty husband left his wife. Desertion is not to be tested by merely ascertaining which party left the matrimonial home first. It may be committed by a husband acting, as I have just said, and if the attitude of the parties remain the same for two years, the offence of desertion contemplated by the statute is complete. I may add that the American writer BISHOP, in his work on the law of marriage and divorce (LAW OF MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE (Edn. 1891), vol. 1, s. 1710) has the following passage on the subject of desertion :

“It is immaterial which of the married parties leaves the matrimonial home, the one who intends bringing the cohabitation to an end commits the desertion.”

I am of opinion that upon the facts proved in evidence before me in the present case the respondent has been guilty of adultery coupled with desertion for two years and upwards, and I pronounce a decree nisi, with costs.

SCHOLFIELD v. LORD LONDESBOROUGH

Bill of Exchange—Alteration—Forgery—Increase in amount of bill—Bill accepted in form facilitating forgery—Liability of acceptor.

The principle under which, where a person who receives a mandate is misled by the negligence of the person who gives it, the loss must fall exclusively on the giver—as where the neglect of due caution by the customer of a bank in drawing a cheque has caused his bankers to make a payment, as a result of subsequent forgery, of a greater amount than that for which the cheque was drawn—is not applicable to a case between the acceptor of a bill and a subsequent holder. There is no duty on the acceptor of a bill of exchange to see, before he accepts the bill, that it is not so drawn as to render a subsequent fraudulent alteration possible.

S. drew a bill of exchange on the respondent. The bill was drawn upon a stamp sufficient to cover a much larger sum than that which appeared on the face of it, and spaces were intentionally left in the body of the bill which would facilitate alterations. After the respondent had accepted the bill, S. fraudulently inserted words and figures which altered the amount from £500 to £3,500. The bill so altered afterwards came into the hands of the appellant as a bona fide endorsee for value. In an action on the bill by the appellant against the respondent,

Held: the respondent was not liable for more than £500, the original amount of the bill.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., and RIGBY, L.J., and LOPES, L.J., dissenting), [1895] 1 Q.B. 536, affirming on different grounds a decision of CHARLES, J., at the trial of the action without a jury, [1894] 2 Q.B. 660, in favour of the defendant.

The action was to recover £3,500 on a bill of exchange, dated Sept. 8, 1890, and drawn by one Francis Charles Scott Sanders upon, and accepted by, the respondent. The appellant became the holder of the bill in good faith and for valuable consideration. The bill when accepted by the respondent was for £500 only, and before it was endorsed it had been fraudulently altered into a bill for £3,500. The bill bore a £2 stamp, which was sufficient to cover £4,000. In the left-hand corner of the bill at the time of the acceptance were the figures "500," preceded by the sign "£." Between the "£," however, and the figures Sanders had left a space sufficiently wide to admit of another figure being interpolated. As originally drawn the body of the bill was in three lines. On the first were the words: "Three months after date"; on the second were the words: "Pay to me or my order the sum of"; and on the third were the words: "Five hundred pounds for value received." After the word "of" in the second line there was sufficient space left for the addition of another word; and before the word "five" in the third line there was a space allowing the addition of a word without carrying the third line farther to the left than the word "pay" in the second. CHARLES, J., found that Sanders, having obtained the respondent's acceptance to the bill so drawn, inserted the figure "3" between the sign "£" and the figures "500," and in the body of the instrument added the words "three thousand" between the word "of" on the second line and the words "five hundred" on the third line, writing the word "three" on the second line, and "thousand" on the third line, and in that shape he negotiated it. The learned judge held that the respondent was not estopped by these facts from denying that he had accepted a bill for £3,500; that he was only liable for £500, the amount of the bill as originally drawn and accepted; and, this sum having been paid into court, he gave judgment for the defendant. The Court of Appeal, affirming this decision, held that there was no duty on the respondent to scrutinise the form of the bill.

July 31, 1896. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case the appellant brought an action against the respondent on what purported to be a bill of exchange for £3,500. The respondent's name attached to the bill in question was genuine. He had, in fact, accepted a bill for £500, but, by fraudulent alteration, amounting to forgery, the amount for which the respondent accepted was increased to the sum sued for. It is not contended that the bill is not a forgery and, if nothing else appeared, it would of course be a sufficient defence for the acceptor to plead and prove that he never accepted any such bill as that for which the plaintiff brought his action. But it is contended that the form of the bill was such that the respondent was negligent in accepting it. The bill, as originally accepted, was so far in ordinary form and perfect that, but for some criminal act, it was, in its then form, a complete bill of exchange, leaving nothing to be added to or taken from it. It is said, indeed, that certain spaces were left which gave opportunity for the insertion of the added words and figures, and if by that is meant that the words and figures were not written so closely together as to prevent the insertion of other words and figures, the observation is true. But when it is said that certain spaces were left, it is to be remembered that there was nothing unusual or calculated to excite attention in the intervals between the written words and figures by which the bill was made. As a matter of fact, the person who drew the bill intended to draw it in such a way as to enable him to fill up the intervals between the letters and figures in question; but, to my mind, there was nothing suspicious in the appearance of the bill when tendered to the respondent for acceptance calculated to put him on his guard.

I cannot myself understand why the particular form of fraud adopted in this case should have any different operation in giving validity to a forged instrument rather than other forms of fraud to which instruments are subject. I am not aware of any principle known to the law which should attach such consequences to a written instrument when no such principle is applicable in any other region of jurisprudence where a man's own carelessness has given opportunity for the commission of a crime. A man, for instance, does not lose his right to his property if he has unnecessarily exposed his goods, or allowed his pocket-handkerchief to hang out of his pocket; he could recover against a bona fide purchaser of any article so lost, notwithstanding the fact that his conduct had to some extent assisted the thief. It is true that stolen goods sold in market overt could be retained by a bona fide purchaser for value, notwithstanding they had been previously stolen; but the same result would follow equally whether the owner had been careful or careless in the custody of his goods.

The truth is, that the whole doctrine, that facilitating forgery or giving opportunity for forgery, or so acting that a forgery is a possible result, affects the validity of the instrument forged, may be traced, in English law at all events, to Young v. Grote (1) and probably beyond, to certain doctrines of the Roman civil law, which, to my mind, form no part of the law merchant so far as it exists in English jurisprudence. That case has been pushed so far in argument that I think that the time has come when it would be desirable to deal with it authoritatively by your Lordships, and to examine how far it ought to be quoted as an authority for anything. It is to be observed that, when one looks at the judgments delivered, there is an inextricable confusion, not only among the different judges, but in the judgment of each judge in turn. BEST, C.J., says (4 Bing. at p. 259):

“If Young, instead of leaving the cheque with a female, had left it with a man of business, he would have guarded against fraud in the mode of filling it up.”

So that here the negligence is made to consist, so far as the drawer was concerned, in leaving a cheque, already signed in blank, with a female unacquainted with business, and in accordance with this view the learned judge goes on to distinguish Hall v. Fuller (2), because, he says, the alteration in that case was not made by the drawer's clerk, nor a person improperly trusted by him, but by an entire stranger who accidentally became possessed of the cheque. PARK, J., again distinguishing Hall v. Fuller (2), says (ibid. at p. 260):

“Can anyone say that the cheque signed by Young is not a genuine order? I say it is. The cheques left by him to be filled up by his wife, when filled up by her, became his genuine orders.”

This is an intelligible ground; but the learned judge immediately adds that the arbitrator had found negligence on the part of the drawer, and he says he concurs, and then goes on:

“He leaves blank cheques in the hands of his wife, who was ignorant of business, but having left them with her to be filled up as the exigency of the moment might require, they became upon her issuing them his genuine orders.”

It is manifest that the learned judge oscillates between the two views. In the perfectly sound view upon which he decides in the defendant's favour he adds the absolutely irrelevant statement that the cheques were left in the hands of the wife, who was ignorant of business. BURROUGH, J., seems only to deal with the question of negligence, and says the blame is all on one side, while GASELEE, J., points out the circumstances negating the general authority of the clerk, who was the actual forger, either to fill up cheques or to receive money from the bank; these circumstances, he says, might have strengthened the case.

It is not very surprising that a variety of reasons have been given by various judges for not disagreeing with the case. The arbitrator had decided that there was negligence, and PARK, J., as is apparent, puts forward, and justly puts forward, the argument that by the act of the drawer's wife that cheque became the husband's genuine order. Shortly put, the argument is that he attached his genuine signature, leaving it to be filled up by his wife, and, as the learned judge emphatically says, “when filled up by his wife they became his genuine orders.” If that is a true view of the case, and that is the learned judge's reasoning, it could not be doubted but that it was the drawer's genuine order. I am not concerned to discuss whether the particular mode in which a written order which was given by the banker to his customers for the purpose of being filled up in the usual way before signing it may afford ground for saying that the banker was misled by his own customer. If, to use LORD CRANWORTH's phraseology, the customer by any act of his has induced the banker to act upon the document by his act or neglect of some act usual in the course of dealing between them, it is quite intelligible that he should not be permitted to set up his own act or neglect to the prejudice of the banker whom he has thus misled, or by neglect permitted to be misled: Bank of Ireland (Governor & Co.) v. Evans' Charities Trustees (3). I do not say that, had I been the arbitrator, I could have agreed that there was in the particular case any such neglect as would have come up to this proposition; but the principle, as LORD CRANWORTH says, is a familiar one, though it may not have been properly applied to the then state of facts. Your Lordships have acted upon it in Ireland v. Livingston (4), and in Bank of England v. Vagliano Bros. (5), and the minuteness with which the arbitrator described the printed forms of drafts which were supplied by the bankers to their customers indicates what was in his mind as to what I will describe as an agreed or assumed course of business between banker and customer, and under those circumstances the finding of negligence which was conclusive upon the court might have justified it in assuming that the facts brought it up for the proposition which LORD CRANWORTH suggests; but, unfortunately I think, BEST, C.J., adopted the argument presented to him that POTHIER might be quoted as an authority decisive of the case, and I think that some of the confusion that has arisen upon the frequent occasions when the case has been quoted has resulted from a misapplication of what POTHIER, in fact, has said, and the more serious assumption that what he has said forms any part of the mercantile law of England.

POTHIER, in his TREATISE ON BILLS OF EXCHANGE, commenting on SCACCHIA, a Roman lawyer of the seventeenth century, gives a variety of illustrations sometimes adopting and sometimes modifying the rules which SCACCHIA lays down. But I think it impossible adequately to deal with the matter without having both the text and the commentary before us. They are as follows (SCACCHIAE TRACT DE COMMER. pp. 390, 391):

“Summaria.—Falsificatis litteris cambii ab eo, cui litteræ illæ solui debent; et proinde, soluta majori summa, cujus sit damnum (n. 393 et seqq.). Falsificationis vitium aliquando est patens (sub nu. 393 vers. primus, et n. 394). Et quandoque latens (n. 395). Bancherii debent esse cauti in solutionibus cædularum, etc. (n. 397). Falsificatio litterarum cambii raro posset hodie contingere (n. 399). Quæro XV. Dubitatur, an hoc damnum pati, debeat Bergonzus quia male soluerit, vel Viuianus, quia non cautelate scripserit characteres, vel tu, quia elegeris malum virum ad exigendum, et sic ad quem ex his spectet hoc periculum? Pro resolutione distinguo in primis duos casus falsificationis seu vitiationis litterarum.

“Primus casus est, quando falsificatio seu vitium litterarum est ita patens et evidens ut a quolibet campso, qui accurata, et debita uteretur diligentia, cognosceretur, et isto casu concludo, quod periculum pertinet ad Bergonzum, qui malè soluit; et ratio est, quia ipse soluendo illas litteras falsas fuit in culpa, cum teneretur inquirere veritatem, et sua culpa sibi et non aliis debet nocere (Ang. cons. 370 creditor, sub n. 1 vers. pro hoc adduco ibi, sed si falsific. et in fine consilii. quem sequitur Foll. ad Maran. in spec., par. 6, Act. 6, n. 54 vers. sed nunquid campsor. fol. 387). Exemplifica istum casum, quando ex comparisonem litterarum, adhibito peritorum iudicio, cognosci potuisset falsificatio (Ang. ubi sup.) vel quando appareret aliqua rasura, seu aliud vitium visibile, et demum esset in culpa, quoties in litteris esset tale quid quod ipsas redderet suspectas de falso, quia paria sunt, civiliter loquendo, litteras esse falsas vel esse suspectas de falso ut secutus sum in meo trac. de iudic. caus., etc., lib. 2, cap. ii., n. 165, præsertim in futura impressione.

“Secundus casus est, quando falsificatio erat ita latens, ut etiam a perito et diligenti campso cognosci non potuisset, quia nulla præ se ferebat suspicionem; et isto casu concludo contrarium; nempe periculum non pertinere ad Bergonzum, quia solvendo, non fuit in aliqua culpa et consequenter recte soluendo, est liberatus, tam a Viuiano, qui scripsit quam a te, qui es creditor (Ang. d. cons., 370, sub num. 1, ibi. sed si culpa campso nulla, etc., et sub n. 2, in fine consilii, vers. concludo igitur, et Foller. ubi sup.). Declara, hujus secundi casus conclusionem esse veram, quando mercator scripsit litteras et sic supposita substantia negotii; secus quando mercator nullas scripsisset litteras, quia tunc licet aliquis ita mercatoris manum contrafecisset, i.e., imitatus esset, ut nullus peritus potuisset cognoscere diversitatem manus, i.e., litterarum, et consequenter nulla posset attribui culpa, desidia, negligentia, seu inexperientia ipsi campsori, quia quilibet fuisset deceptus tamen adhuc damnum erit ipsius solius, et ratio est, quia si mercator secum in hoc non contraxit periculum remanet ipsi soli campsori. Infero ex hac declaratione, quod Bancherii, seu nummularii debent esse cauti in scripturis, et subscriptionibus cedularum, et illarum recognitionibus, quia si soluerint pecuniam cum cedulis, seu apochis falsis, quæ eis præsentantur, et quas ipsi veras præsupponunt, quando soluunt, cogentur iterum soluere veris dominis pecuniarum, quia male soluerunt: Vinc. de Franchi dec. 304, sæpe sæpius, dicens, sæpe sæpius id evenire in Civitate Neapolis.

“POTHIER, CONTRAT DE CHANGE, Part 1, c. 4, s. 99, vol. 4, Ed. Bugnet, pp. 516-518:—“99, SCACCHIA, Tract. de Comm., § 2, gl. 5, quæst. 15, propose cette question : Le porteur de la lettre de change l'a falsifiée, et a écrit une plus grande somme que celle portée par la lettre; la falsification est faite de manière qu'elle peut tromper une personne attentive et intelligente. Le banquier qui, trompé par la falsification de la lettre que lui a été présentée, a payé au porteur la somme entière que paraissait portée par la lettre; aura-t-il la répétition contre le tireur, son mandant, de ce qu'il a payé de plus que la somme qui était effectivement et véritablement portée par la lettre? SCACCHIA décide pour l'affirmative. On peut dire pour son opinion, que, selon les règles du contrat de mandat, le mandant s'oblige à rembourser le mandataire de tous les déboursés auxquels le mandat aura donné lieu, pourvu que le mandataire n'ait pas par sa faute déboursé plus qu'il ne fallait: Mandator debet refundere mandatario quidquid ei inculpabiliter abest ex causâ mandati, comme nous l'avons établi en Pand. Justin., tit. Mand., No. 53 et seq. Or, le paiement qu'a fait le banquier de la somme entière qui, par la falsification de la lettre, paraissait être portée dans la lettre qu'on lui a présentée, est un déboursé auquel le mandat du tireur a donné lieu; et l'on ne peut en cela reprocher aucune faute à ce banquier [Non, sans doute, mais il a été victime d'une fraude] puisqu'on suppose que la falsification était telle qu'elle pouvait surprendre un homme intelligent; le tireur ne peut donc pas se dispenser de rembourser le banquier sur qui il a tiré la lettre, de la somme entière qu'il a payée; sauf au tireur à exercer l'action du banquier, conditionem indebiti, contre le porteur de la lettre, pour la répétition de ce qu'il a reçu de plus que la somme qui était véritablement portée par la lettre. Si ce porteur de la lettre est un homme insolvable, c'est le tireur qui doit souffrir de cette insolvabilité, puisque son mandataire n'est pas en faute.

“100. Cependant si c’était par la faute du tireur que le banquier eût été induit en erreur, le tireur n’ayant pas eu le soin d’écrire sa lettre de manière à prévenir les falsifications, puta s’il avait écrit en chiffres la somme tirée par la lettre, et qu’on eût ajouté un zéro, le tireur serait en ce cas tenu d’indemniser le banquier de ce qu’il a souffert de la falsification de la lettre, à laquelle le tireur, par sa faute, a donné lieu; et c’est à ce cas qu’on doit restreindre la décision de SCACCHIA. [Pourquoi cette distinction? si la lettre de change dans laquelle la somme est énoncée en chiffres est valable, il n’y a aucune faute reprochable à celui qui l’a ainsi créée; la raison de décider reste la même.] La distinction que nous faisons entre le cas auquel un mandataire a souffert quelque dommage à l’occasion du mandat, sans qu’il y eût eu aucune faute de la part du mandant et celui auquel le mandant a donné occasion au dommage par sa faute, est fondée sur des textes de droit. Paul, en la loi 26, § 7, ff. Mandat, décide que, si je vous ai chargé de m’acheter un certain esclave, et que cet esclave, après que vous l’avez acheté, et avant que vous me l’ayez envoyé, vous a volé, je suis obligé de vous indemniser de cette perte que vous avez soufferte à l’occasion du mandat, dans le cas auquel j’aurais connu cet esclave pour être un voleur; parce que, dans ce cas, je suis en faute de ne vous en avoir pas averti; mais que, hors ce cas, je ne suis point obligé de vous indemniser du vol que vous avez souffert à l’occasion du mandat, mais seulement de vous abandonner l’esclave pour le vol, de même que j’y serais obligé envers tout autre auquel il aurait fait quelque vol ou causé quelque dommage.

“Il est vrai qu’Africain, en la loi 61, alias 63, § 5 ff, de Furtis, décide que vous êtes tenu de m’indemniser du vol, même dans le cas auquel vous n’auriez pas eu connaissance que cet esclave était voleur, etiamsi ignoraveritis qui certum hominem emi mandaverit furem esse nihilominus tamen damnum decidere cogetur. . . . Mais c'est qu'Africain pensait que, même en ce cas, c'était la faute du mandant qui avait donné lieu au dommage qu'avait souffert le mandataire, et que le mandant était en faute de ne s'être pas informé des mœurs de l'esclave dont il avait chargé son mandataire de faire l'emplète; nam certe, dit-il, mandantis culpam esse qui talem servum emi sibi mandaverit. C'est donc à ce cas auquel le dommage, souffert par le mandataire à l'occasion du mandat, pourrait être attribué à quelque faute du mandant, qu'on doit restreindre tout ce qui est dit dans cette loi: Justissime procuratorem allegare, non fuisse se id damnum passurum si mandatum non suscepisset; et plus bas: Æquius esse, nemini officium suum (quod ejus cum quo contraxerit, non etiam sui commodi causâ suscepit) damnosum esse. Lorsque c'est la faute du mandataire qui a donné lieu au dommage qu'il a souffert à l'occasion du mandat, il n'est pas douteux qu'il ne peut pas demander à en être indemnisé: (ead. l. 6, s. 7).

"101. Il résulte de tout ceci qu'on ne doit pas décider indistinctement que le tireur doive indemniser le banquier de la perte qui lui a causée l'erreur en laquelle l'a induit la falsification de la lettre, et qu'on doit décider, au contraire, que le tireur n'est tenu de cette indemnité que dans le cas auquel, par quelque faute de sa part ou par celle de son facteur, il aurait donné lieu à cette falsification, faute d'avoir, en écrivant la lettre, pris les précautions qu'il pouvait prendre pour la prévenir. [Comment rendre le tireur de bonne foi, responsable d'un fait qui est absolument étranger et auquel il n'a pu participer en rien? il serait d'ailleurs impossible de préciser les précautions qu'il y aurait à prendre. Il s'agit d'une fraude commise par un tiers au préjudice du tiré, après que la lettre de change a été mise en circulation.] Dans le cas même où le mandant n'aurait pas eu le soin de prendre ces précautions, le mandataire ne pourra pas répéter du tireur ce qu'il a payé de plus que la somme qui était véritablement portée par la lettre, si la falsification pouvait s'apercevoir avec quelque attention; car, en ce cas c'est la faute, du banquier de n'avoir pas bien examiné la lettre qui lui a été présentée; et il n'est pas recevable, suivant les principes ci-dessus, à l'indemnité d'une perte à laquelle il a donné lieu par sa faute."

I do not myself think that either the original by SCACCHIA or the commentary by POTHIER are relevant to the matter in hand. We are not dealing here with either "mandant" or "mandatory," and I do not think that it is part of the commercial law of England, howsoever applied, and before accepting the modified doctrine of POTHIER it is well to see what that doctrine is. That learned author, who gives the case of the forger who has added a cipher to the sum written in figures, and gives it expressly as an example illustrative of his principle, proceeds to show that it is founded on certain pronouncements of the civil law, and proceeds accordingly to show that a slave sold with a knowledge that he was a thief makes his master responsible to the purchaser for any theft he may commit. M. BUGNET, the learned commentator, points out in the note quoted, that it is impossible to render the drawer responsible for an act to which he is no party, and it would be impossible to particularise all the precautions that it would be necessary to take. The language used, la faute du tireur, may be satisfied by a great many things which certainly the English law would not recognise as an answer, but which the language of POTHIER would obviously include. The careless keeping of a cheque-book, like the careless keeping of the seal in Bank of Ireland (Governor & Co.) v. Evans Charities Trustees (3), might well satisfy the words faute du tireur, and I confess I should regard with great apprehension a decision that anything that a jury should regard as faute du tireur should render a forged instrument valid. As M. BUGNET truly says, it is impossible to particularise all the things that might have to be considered; the sort of paper, the ink. There are well-known precautions, which, for greater security, some banks take to prevent the forgery of their notes. There is some colour which prevents, or at all events renders difficult, imitations by photography, and is it to be in each case a question for the jury whether this or that precaution was omitted in drawing a bill, or in accepting it when drawn? It seems to me that it would be a very serious proposition to lay down that such questions should be permitted to arise when dealing with such an instrument as a bill of exchange, and other questions would then arise, as, I think, was pointed out in the course of the argument—a minute examination of every bill tendered for acceptance, and a consideration of how far its form might give an opportunity to a forger to forge and escape detection.

This very case has in almost precisely similar circumstances been already decided in the Adelphi Bank v. Edwards (6), and I regret very much that that case has not been reported. I entirely concur with what LINDLEY, L.J., said in that case, that it was wrong to contend that it is negligence to sign a negotiable instrument so that somebody else can tamper with it; and the wider proposition of BOVILL, C.J., in a former case, Société Générale v. Metropolitan Bank, Ltd. (7), that people are not supposed to commit forgery, and that the protection against forgery is not the vigilance of parties excluding the possibility of committing forgery, but the law of the land. It appears to me that even the modified rule laid down by POTHIER, considering the principles on which that learned author relies for its acceptance, is not and never has been the law of England. I think that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

LORD WATSON (having stated the facts): The case was tried before CHARLES, J., upon the facts already stated, with these further admissions made by the appellant: (i) that the respondent was ignorant of bill transactions; (ii) that he knew nothing about the stamp laws, and (iii) that he had good reason to place implicit confidence in the honesty of Scott Sanders. With regard to the first and second of these admissions, I must observe that, in my opinion, ignorance of bill transactions or of the stamp laws will not, in a question with an onerous and bona fide holder, absolve persons who, notwithstanding their ignorance, choose to engage in such transactions, from the fulfilment of any duty or obligation which the law imposes upon the parties to a bill of exchange. The reasonable belief of the respondent in the honesty of the person by whom the bill was drawn and presented to him for acceptance might, if he was under a legal duty to take precautions against its fraudulent alteration, be an element of importance in considering whether, as matter of fact, he acted negligently as the appellant alleges.

The appellant did not maintain that the respondent either directly authorised, or meant to authorise, Scott Sanders to alter the amount of the bill. Nor did he maintain that the respondent had by his subsequent conduct, homologated or adopted the alteration. He contended that the law merchant imposes upon every person who either draws or accepts a bill of exchange with a view to its circulation, the duty of taking reasonable precautions, in order to prevent the possibility of its amount being fraudulently increased; that the respondent negligently failed to perform that duty, inasmuch as he accepted a bill written upon a stamp sufficient to cover the altered amount, and having spaces left blank in the writing, which enabled the drawer to fill them up in such a manner as to effect, and at the same time to conceal, his fraud; and that, by reason of such negligence, the respondent is estopped from denying his liability for the full amount of £3,500 appearing on the face of the bill. CHARLES, J., who appears to have relied upon the authority of Young v. Grote (1), held in point of law that, if the acceptor of a bill of exchange "signs it negligently in such a shape as to render alteration a likely result, he is responsible on the altered instrument." Upon the facts of the case the learned judge came to the conclusion that the respondent had not been guilty of negligence; but, in respect that the alteration of the bill was not apparent, he found that the appellant was entitled to the money which had been paid into court, and entered judgment for the respondent. His decision was affirmed, but not upon the same grounds, by a majority of the Court of Appeal. The Master of the Rolls and RIGBY,

L.J., were of opinion that, although the rule contended for by the appellant might prevail as between a customer and his banker, it was not applicable, according to English law, as between the acceptor of a bill of exchange and subsequent holders. Their Lordships were further of opinion that the rule, assuming it to have previously existed, was abolished by s. 64 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. LOPES, L.J., dissented, being of opinion that the principle of Young v. Grote (1) applied, as between the acceptor and an indorsee acquiring right to the bill after his acceptance; and his Lordship also, differing from CHARLES, J., held that the respondent had been negligent, and that the appellant ought, therefore, to have judgment for the full amount of the bill as fraudulently altered.

In these circumstances it becomes necessary to examine the authorities which were noticed by the learned judges, or were cited in the able argument addressed to us on behalf of the appellant. Such of these authorities as really bear upon the doctrine propounded by the appellant are few in number. Of the rest, some have a very distant relation to it; while others are irrelevant. The basis of the appellant's argument is to be found in Young v. Grote (1). In that case the customer of a bank signed several blank cheques, and gave them to his wife to be filled up and negotiated by her as she required. In one of these the sum of £50 was inserted, in her presence, and at her request, by a clerk, to whom she then gave the cheque in order that he might get the money for her. In writing the sum the clerk had left spaces, with fraudulent intent, so as to enable him to increase the amount to £350, which was paid to him by the banker. BEST, C.J., and three other learned judges of the King's Bench held, in these circumstances, that the banker was entitled to take credit, in account with his customer, for the full amount which he had paid upon the cheque. The doctrine laid down by POTHIER (TRAITE DU CONTRAT DE CHANGE, c. 4, art. 3, s. 99) was referred to with approval by some of the learned judges. In that passage the author deals with the mutual rights and obligations arising out of the contract of mandate which subsists between a banker and the mandant whose cheques or orders he has undertaken to pay. He notices the rule of the Roman law, which had been followed by SCACCHIA to the effect that mandator debet refundere mandatario quicquid ei inculpabiliter abest ex causâ mandati. According to that rule the customer would be liable for the amount of a fraudulently altered cheque, in every case where the banker could not have detected the alteration by the exercise of reasonable care. POTHIER qualifies the rule, and in so far favours the customer by limiting his liability to those cases in which his own negligence in drawing the cheque has given the opportunity for its alteration. The reported opinions of the learned judges leave it doubtful whether their decision in Young v. Grote (1) went upon the doctrine of POTHIER, or upon the ground that the customer, by signing a blank cheque, had undertaken liability for any sum which might be filled in before it was presented for payment.

I think that LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., must have had the first of these grounds in view when he said in Bank of Ireland (Governor & Co.) v. Evans' Charities Trustees (3) (5 H.L.Cas. at p. 413):

"Now, the case of Young v. Grote (1) went upon that ground (whether correctly arrived at in point of fact is immaterial) that the plaintiff there was estopped from saying that he did not sign the cheque for £350, and if the circumstances are such, whether arising from negligence or from any other cause, that, as between the customer and his banker, the customer is estopped from saying that he did not sign the cheque for a particular amount, that, as between them, is the same as if he had signed it."

On the other hand, PARKE, B., when delivering the opinion of seven judges of the Exchequer Chamber in Roberts v. Tucker (8), indicates that Young v. Grote (1) was decided upon the second ground. After referring to the facts of that case, he observed (16 Q.B. at p. 580):

"This was in truth considering that the customer had, by signing a blank cheque, given authority to the person in whose hands it was to fill up the cheque in any way the blank permitted."

Halifax Union v. Wheelwright (9) appears to me to be a decision in entire conformity with the doctrine of POTHIER. The guardians were in the habit of passing orders upon their treasurer, who was local agent of the bank in which their money was deposited. Some of these orders were written by their clerk and thereafter signed by the guardians, having been drawn by the clerk in such a way that he was enabled to increase their amounts before he presented them for payment. The court held that the treasurer was in the same position as if he had been their banker; and that the guardians were estopped, by their negligent drawing of the orders, from maintaining that he had not their authority to pay the full amount of these orders, as fraudulently increased.

In my opinion, Young v. Grote (1) can have no bearing on the present case, if it was decided on the ground that the customer, by signing a blank cheque, had given implied authority to fill it up, to any subsequent holder. Whoever signs a cheque or accepts a bill in blank, and then puts it into circulation, must necessarily intend that either the person to whom he gives it, or some future holder, shall fill up the blank which he has left. No such inference would be reasonable in the case where the drawer or acceptor signs for a particular sum specified on the face of the document. If, on the other hand, the decision in Young v. Grote (1) was based upon the ratio that the customer, in filling up the cheque through his wife, whom he had constituted his agent for that purpose, had failed in the duty which he owed to his banker by giving facilities for its fraudulent alteration, I am not prepared to affirm that it cannot be supported by authority. But it does not, in my opinion, necessarily follow that the same rule must be applied between the acceptor of a bill of exchange and a holder acquiring right to it after acceptance. The duty of the customer arises directly out of the contractual relation existing at the time between him and the banker, who is his mandatory. There is no such connection between the drawer or acceptor and possible future endorsees of a bill of exchange. The duty which the appellant's argument assigns to an acceptor is towards the public, or, what is much the same thing, towards those members of the public who may happen to acquire right to the bill after it has been criminally tampered with. Apart from authority, I do not think that the imposition of such a duty can be justified on any sound legal principle. In many, if not most cases which occur in the course of business, the bill is written out by the drawer, and sent by him to the acceptor, who is under an obligation to sign it. Assuming the appellant's argument to be well founded, it would be within the right of the acceptor to return the bill unsigned, if it were not drawn so as to exclude all reasonable possibilities of fraud or forgery. The exercise of that right might lead to very serious complications in commercial transactions. Besides, it is not consistent with the general spirit of the law to hold innocent persons responsible for not taking measures to prevent the commission of a crime which they may have no reason to anticipate, although there may be an exception in the case where one of the parties to the instrument has, either by express agreement or by implication established in the law, become bound to use such precautions.

I am, therefore, unwilling in the case of an acceptor to affirm the doctrine upon which the appellant relies, unless it can be shown to be established by authority as part of the English law merchant. I shall briefly refer to four decisions because they were either cited in argument or have been discussed in this or similar cases by the courts below. All of these cases related to bills of exchange; but in none of them had there been any alteration of the amount for which the acceptor signed. In Ingham v. Primrose (10) the facts were that a blank acceptance was returned to the acceptor in the same condition in which it had been issued by him. He tore the bill in two, and threw away both parts in the street, where they were picked up by a passer by who pasted them together and negotiated the restored bill. The acceptor was found liable to an onerous holder, not because he had signed a bill which facilitated fraud, but upon the obvious consideration that he had negligently put into circulation a negotiable document which had not been properly cancelled. Arnold v. Cheque Bank (11) had its origin in these circumstances. A firm in New York purchased there a genuine bill on London, which they endorsed to an English creditor, and inclosed in a letter addressed to him. The letter inclosing the bill was stolen from the firm's letter-box by one of their clerks, and the stolen bill was paid by the Cheque Bank in London, upon a forged endorsement [purporting to be that of the creditor]. It was held that such payment did not afford a good defence to the bank against a claim by the genuine endorsee and true owner of the bill. No question arose as to any duty owing by the acceptor of the bill. In Baxendale v. Bennett (12) it was decided that an acceptor was not liable to a holder upon a bill accepted by him in blank, which had been stolen from his drawer and filled up and circulated by the thief. A different decision was given in London and South Western Bank v. Wentworth (13), where a bill signed by him in blank was entrusted by the acceptor, for the purpose of its being negotiated, to a person who fraudulently filled in a larger sum than the acceptor intended, disposed of the bill, and appropriated its proceeds. The difference of result in those two cases was plainly due to the fact that in the one the acceptor had not, and in the other he had, issued the bill as a negotiable document. But in neither case did the decision of the court turn upon the supposed duty of the acceptor to guard against fraudulent alterations of the bill.

I shall now proceed to consider the remaining and only English authorities which appear to me to be in point. Before doing so I think it is not immaterial to observe that POTHIER, who is the real author of the doctrine relied on by the appellant, in the passage cited by the learned judges who decided Young v. Grote (1), only applies it to the case of a banker and his customer. But in art. 3 of the same chapter of his treatise, the learned author discusses the nature of the contract which is constituted between the drawer and acceptor of a bill which he asserts to be "un vrai contrat de mandat, mandatum solvendæ pecuniæ." I think it is apparent, from the context of art. 3, that the rule laid down by POTHIER in s. 99, was meant by him to apply, not only as between banker and customer, but as between a drawer and an acceptor who pays in compliance with his drawer's mandate. But the rule has no application to parties between whom there is no subsisting contract of mandate. According to its terms an acceptor who paid the full sum appearing upon the face of a bill which he knew, or had reason to believe, had been fraudulently increased after his acceptance, would have no right to recover the increased amount from his drawer.

It was argued that certain expressions used by BLACKBURN, J., in Swan v. North British Australasian Co. (14), tend to show that the rule which POTHIER applies to a customer who draws a cheque upon his banker has application also as between the acceptor of a bill and possible future holders. His Lordship there said (2 H. & C. at pp. 182, 183), with reference to Young v. Grote (1):

"It may be that the case is to be supported upon some of the grounds there stated, or upon the broader ground apparently supported by the authority of POTHIER in the passage cited in Young v. Grote (1) that the person putting in circulation a bill of exchange does, by the law merchant, owe a duty to all parties to the bill to take reasonable precautions against the possibility of fraudulent alterations in it; it is not necessary to inquire how that may be."

LOPES, L.J., infers from these words that

"it is impossible not to see that in the case of negotiable instruments BLACKBURN, J., thought that the duty did exist."

I am unable to assent to that inference. The words convey anything but a hearty approval of the decision in Young v. Grote (1); and at the most they do not even amount to obiter dicta. They contain no expression of judicial opinion, and do nothing more than state the tenor of an argument which the noble and learned Lord had not found it necessary to consider. One thing seems certain, namely, that his Lordship had not examined the text of POTHIER, which contains no such doctrine as his words impute.

Several points were raised for the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in Société Générale v. Metropolitan Bank, Ltd. (7), and one of these came very near to the question which your Lordships have to consider in this case. The time of payment of a bill of exchange had, after issue, been fraudulently altered from eight to eighty days after date. The alteration being material, it was sought to make the acceptor liable, upon the ground that he had negligently left a vacant space in the bill, between the words "eight" and "days," which enabled the fraudulent holder to add the letter "y" without risk of the fraud being detected upon inspection of the document. The Court, consisting of BOVILL, C.J., with KEATING and BRETT, JJ., came to the conclusion that the acceptor was not liable. None of the learned judges affirmed that there was any duty incumbent upon the acceptor to take precautions against forgery, and on that assumption, they all held that there had been no negligence. Two of them used language which does not appear to me to be consistent with the existence of such a duty. The Chief Justice observed (27 L.T. at p. 856) :

"Persons are not to be supposed to commit forgery, and the protection against such a claim is the law of the land, not the vigilance of parties in excluding all possibility of committing it."

BRETT, J., said (ibid. at pp. 857, 858) :

"I not only protest that there was no negligence, but say that no judge ought to leave to a jury the fact as evidence of negligence. But there is no duty on anyone to suppose that those, against whose character there is no imputation, will commit forgery whenever the opportunity occurs."

The next and the last of the English authorities, which raised the same questions of law and fact which occur in this appeal, is Adelphi Bank v. Edwards (6), decided in the year 1882. The case has not been reported; but in the course of the argument your Lordships had the advantage of considering the shorthand-writer's notes of the opinions delivered by the learned judges, both in the court of first instance and in the Court of Appeal. From these it appears that the defendant Edwards had accepted a bill for £22 10s., which was written on a stamp sufficient to cover £300. Spaces were left in the writing, which enabled a fraudulent holder to increase the amount of the bill to £222 10s. by inserting the figure "2" between the letter "£" and the figures "22" in the corner of the bill, and by adding the words "two hundred" at the end of one line and the word "and" at the beginning of the next. The plaintiff bank, having paid the increased amount, sued the acceptor upon the same arguments which have been submitted to your Lordships on behalf of the appellant. CHITTY, J., before whom the case was tried, was of opinion that, upon the law contended for by the plaintiff, the defendant had not been guilty of negligence. At the same time the learned judge did not accept that law. He said :

"The defendant, in my opinion, as a prudent man of business, was not bound to contemplate that the bill was coming into fraudulent hands, nor that by the perpetration of a crime it would be altered in the manner in which it has been altered."

In the Court of Appeal the learned judges took the same view of the facts as CHITTY, J.; but they also negatived the existence of any rule or principle requiring the acceptor of a bill to exclude facilities for its alteration. BAGGALLAY, L.J., said :

"It seems to me impossible to say that there was any duty on the part of the acceptor of this bill towards the party who might subsequently become the holder of the bill so to criticise, and so to examine the bill before he signed, as to put it out of the possibility of any additional words being afterwards inserted in it." A

BRETT, L.J., stated forcibly the same opinions which he has expressed, in stronger language and at greater length, in this case. LINDLEY, L.J., after referring to Young v. Grote (1) and "that class of cases," proceeded thus : B

"We cannot say there was negligence here, unless we go the whole length of saying that it is negligent to sign a negotiable instrument so that somebody else can tamper with it. I cannot go that length. I think it would be wrong. There is no authority which compels us to do anything of the sort."

Two decisions of the Court of Session belonging to a period when the commercial law of Scotland was yet in its infancy, Graham v. Gillespie (15) and Pagan and Hunter v. Wylie (16) were founded on by the appellant. Both cases were decided upon what I consider a false analogy, namely, that the acceptor of a bill for a definite amount, which is capable of being fraudulently increased by the insertion of additional words and figures, stands in exactly the same position as the acceptor of a blank bill. The American case of Garrard v. Haddan (17), which was also cited for the appellant, is open to the same criticism. C D

The result of the English authorities is, in my opinion, decidedly adverse to the appellant. Before the present action was brought, the rule for which he contends had, so far as I have been able to find, never been enforced in an English court, or affirmed by an English judge. On the contrary, it had been disapproved by BOVILL, C.J., and BRETT, J., in Société Générale v. Metropolitan Bank, Ltd. (7); and Adelphi Bank v. Edwards (6), in which four judges were unanimous, is a direct precedent against it. It is, no doubt, within the competency of this House to overrule the decision in Adelphi Bank v. Edwards (6), but I see no reason why your Lordships should do so. The doctrine of POTHIER, out of which the contention of the billholder in this and previous litigation has grown, is founded upon reasons which have no application to any question between a drawer or acceptor and a holder acquiring right to the bill after acceptance, and I know of no principle of law which would warrant its extension to that case. I desire to add that, had your Lordships thought fit to accept the legal argument of the appellant, I should not have been of opinion that the claim which he makes in this action was excluded by s. 64 of the Bills of Exchange Act. That section admits an action for the altered amount of the bill when the acceptor has authorised the alteration. Accordingly, on the supposition already made, if it had been shown that he had failed to discharge his legal duty to the appellant, the respondent would have been estopped from saying that he did not authorise the fraud committed by Scott Sanders. That estoppel by negligence would, in my opinion, have been sufficient to establish that the respondent had "authorised" the fraudulent alteration within the meaning of s. 64. For these reasons I also am of opinion that the judgment appealed from ought to be affirmed. E F G H

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—CHAMBERS, J., and LUTHER, L.J., are both of opinion that a person who accepts a bill of exchange, intending that it should be put into circulation, owes to everyone who may become the holder a duty which they define or describe as the duty "not to be negligent with regard to the form of the instrument." Agreeing so far, the opinions of the learned judges diverge at this point. It is part of the history of the case that the bill presented to Lord Lonsborough for his acceptance was designed to facilitate a premeditated forgery. But CHARLES, J., finds that under the circumstances the instrument as presented would not have aroused suspicion in the mind of a reasonably prudent person, and, therefore, he comes to the conclusion that Lord Lonsborough was not guilty of that sort of negligence which would make him liable for the consequences of the crime after- I wards consummated. LOPES, L.J., on the other hand, thinks that the bill before acceptance presented such obvious opportunities for alteration, and such a combination of suspicious circumstances, as ought to have attracted the attention of any man of ordinary prudence. He considers that Lord Londesborough, by his want of care and caution, "enabled" the drawer to commit the forgery. Thinking that forgery was the result "to be anticipated," he holds that Lord Londesborough must suffer for his neglect.

Assuming the existence of the duty which both these learned judges would cast upon the acceptor of a bill of exchange, I should be disposed to agree with CHARLES, J., rather than with the lord justice. To me it seems extravagant to suggest that the acceptor of a bill is bound to be familiar with the different steps in the scale of stamp duties, and to recognise a stamp of a higher grade than is required for the purpose in hand as an indication of fraud. With regard to the gaps, or vacant spaces in the bill as presented to Lord Londesborough, I think that a person of ordinary prudence who had confidence in the man with whom he was dealing, and never had had his attention called to this species of fraud, might well have passed them by unnoticed; or, if he had happened to notice them, might have thought them of no moment. I cannot think that there is any rule which forbids you to give a person with whom you are acquainted, and whom you believe to be honest, some little credit for honesty even when he comes for your promised acceptance to a bill of exchange. I cannot think that even on such an occasion you are bound to scan his handiwork with the eye of a detective, as if it were the production of a would-be forger. The prevention of crime is, perhaps, better left to the operation of the criminal law.

However that may be, I agree with your Lordships in thinking that the supposed duty does not in fact exist. Both the learned judges who are in favour of the doctrine refer it to "the principle of Young v. Grote (1)." Young v. Grote (1) is a case which has excited as much diversity of opinion as any case in the books. It has given rise to various explanations not altogether uniform or consistent. That circumstance of itself is regarded by some judges as a badge of merit, and a passport to the confidence of the profession. But when you are in search of a principle, the effect is rather embarrassing. And, therefore, it is with some diffidence that I venture to inquire what, after all, is the true principle of Young v. Grote (1)?

In Orr and Barber v. Union Bank of Scotland (18), in 1854, and again in Bank of Ireland (Governor & Co.) v. Evans' Charities Trustees (3), in 1855, LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., had occasion to comment on Young v. Grote (1). In the former case, referring to Young v. Grote (1), he says :

"Whether the conclusion, in point of fact, was in that case well warranted is not important to consider. The principle is a sound one, that when the customer's neglect of due caution has caused his bankers to make a payment on a forged order, he shall not set up against them the invalidity of a document which he has induced them to act on as genuine."

If that be the principle of Young v. Grote (1), I do not think it helps the appellant much. It will be observed that LORD CRANWORTH treats the relation of banker and customer as the governing feature in the case. That relation is, I think, a long way off from the connection between the acceptor of a bill and a subsequent holder. The observations of PARKE, B., on Young v. Grote (1), in delivering the opinions of the judges in Bank of Ireland (Governor & Co.) v. Evans' Charities Trustees (3) are much to the same effect. Nor do I think that there is any difference in substance between the views expressed by LORD CRANWORTH himself in the two cases. In the later case he seems to treat the decision in Young v. Grote (1) as founded on estoppel, though, as COCKBURN, C.J., points out, Young v. Grote (1) was "decided without reference to estoppel at all": Swan v. North British Australian Co. (14). Other judges, including PARKE, B., himself, in the earlier case of Roberts v. Tacker (8), in 1851, have held that Young v. Grote (1) is to be supported on the ground that the customer had by signing a blank cheque given authority to anyone in whose hand it was to fill it up in any way the blank permitted. If that is the real ground of the decision it has still less bearing on the present case, where nothing further was required to be added after Lord Londesborough's acceptance to give effect or negotiability to the instrument.

Whatever may be the better ground for supporting the decision in Young v. Grote (1), it is obvious, on referring to the report in BINGHAM, that the court went very much on the authority of the doctrine laid down by POTHIER, that in cases of mandate generally, and particularly in the case of banker and customer, if the person who receives the mandate is misled through the fault of the person who gives it, the loss must fall exclusively on the giver. That is not unreasonable; but the doctrine has no application to the present case. There is no mandate as between the acceptor of a bill and a subsequent holder. The only other case on which much reliance was placed on the part of the appellant was Swan v. North British Australasian Co. (14), which was cited for the observations of BLACKBURN, J., 2 H. & C. at p. 182. With the comments which have been made on those observations by LORD WATSON I quite agree. If the report is correct, the reference to POTHIER is certainly inaccurate.

Passing from authority I must say that I am not at all persuaded that the contention on the part of the appellant can be supported on principle or on grounds of convenience. It was said that the negotiability of bills of exchange would be seriously impaired if persons who act as Lord Londesborough acted are not to be held liable for all the consequences of their want of caution. But I must say that I was very much struck with some observations which fell from one of your Lordships during the argument, that the consequences to the transaction and despatch of mercantile business would be serious indeed if it were laid down that a person under obligation to accept a bill was at liberty to refuse or delay acceptance on the ground that there was something in the form of the instrument of which a skilful forger might perhaps take advantage. After all, it is the drawer of a bill of exchange who has control over its form; the obligation of the acceptor is to pay the bill at maturity. Censorship over the form of the instrument is, I think, no part of his duty. I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD MORRIS.—I am of the same opinion. The liability of the respondent must arise from either, first, his complicity in the fraud, or, secondly, from some contractual relation, express or implied, between him and the holder of the bill of exchange, or, thirdly, from some duty he owed to the holder. There is no pretence of any complicity by the respondent; there is no privity between the appellant and the respondent from which any contract can be spelled out. Is there any duty on the acceptance of a bill to a subsequent holder that the acceptor should scrutinise the bill presented to him for acceptance? In my opinion, none beyond this, that he should see that he accepts a bill filled up, because, if he accepts a bill in blank, that implies an authority to the person getting the acceptance to fill up the amount. In Young v. Grote (1) the cheque was in blank. Even if well decided on its particular facts as a case between banker and customer, I fail to see how it governs this case where the defendant accepted a regularly filled up bill. If the defendant could be held liable it appears to me that an indorser would also be bound to enter on a scrutiny of the bill in order to protect himself from a subsequent holder. This case is an attempt to impose a new duty on an acceptor of a bill of exchange. The doctrine of estoppel binds an acceptor who accepts a blank bill because by doing so he is precluded from setting up as defence that he did not authorise the filling up; that doctrine has no application to the present case.

LORD SHAND.—I concur in thinking the appeal ought to be disallowed. The weight of judicial opinion and authority is clearly against the contention of the appellant, unless, indeed, it could be shown that Young v. Grote (1) had a direct application and that the grounds of that decision were applicable to the facts which have been here proved. The question here raised was expressly decided in 1882 against the view contended for by the appellant, in Adelphi Bank v. Edwards (6), in which the judgment of CHITTY, J., was unanimously affirmed by the Court of Appeal, and besides the opinion of BOVILL, C.J., and BRETT, J., in Société Générale v. Metropolitan Bank, Ltd. (7), the same judgment has now been repeated by a majority of the Court of Appeal.

As to Young v. Grote (1), I find nothing in the grounds of the judgment which supports the proposition that an endorsee of a bill of exchange for value has a legal claim against the acceptor against whom no want of bona fides can be alleged, for a sum beyond the amount for which the acceptance was given, on the ground of negligence in his having given his acceptance to a bill in such a form and impressed with such a stamp as enabled the drawer to commit a forgery by enlarging the amount for which the acceptance was granted in such a way as to escape detection by the endorsee. Young v. Grote (1), between a banker and his customer, was a case in which there was the relation of parties contracting with each other. It appears to me that the ground of decision, as reported, was in conformity with the limited doctrine of POTHIER, that this relation inferred, if not expressly at least by implication, the duty and obligation on the customer's part, in issuing cheques on his banker to third parties, to take care that these were not in such a form as to give the means of enlarging their amount without this being readily detected. In that view of the case the decision does not apply here, where the acceptor and the endorsee of the bill were strangers to each other, having no relation as contracting parties which could imply the duty and obligation of the banker's customer to the banker. If, as has been suggested, the decision in Young v. Grote (1) turned on the fact that the customer had signed cheques wholly blank in amount, by which the person acquiring possession might be held to have a mandate to fill in any sum he chose, the case has no application to the present. The acceptor here signed no bill blank in the sum, for there was expressed in writing in the body of the bill the amount for which he agreed to undertake liability.

I agree with your Lordships in holding that there is no sound reason or legal principle to support the view that, on the ground of negligence, an acceptor of a bill becomes liable to a subsequent holder for a sum beyond the amount of his acceptance because the form of the document and the stamp used admit of a forgery in the hands of a dishonest person, such as occurred in this case. As to the stamp, I do not believe that in the course of ordinary business persons accepting bills scrutinise the paper on which a bill is written to see the amount it will carry, and I am certainly not prepared to say they are in any way required, as a matter of duty or obligation, to do so. Stamps of higher value than necessary must be often used when it is difficult or inconvenient to get a stamp of the precise value wanted. As to the form of the document, I think an acceptor, while himself acting bona fide, who has the sum for which he has agreed to grant his acceptance expressed in the body of the bill, is not called upon to anticipate and provide against forgery. To hold the contrary would lead to great inconvenience in business. An acceptor scrutinising a bill might think it left room for a fraudulent addition, and might refuse acceptance to the serious injury of the drawer residing at a distance or abroad, or of a drawer who might have endorsed the bill for value given before acceptance, and he might be involved in litigation and found to have been unduly apprehensive and in the wrong, while after acceptance numerous and difficult questions might frequently arise as to what constituted negligence in particular cases like the present, in which two learned judges have differed on the point.

I think that the appellant has failed to show that his contention is founded on sound legal principle; and though cases of successful fraud and forgery will no doubt occur from time to time, notwithstanding the risk of penal consequences incurred by the forger, yet a decision giving effect to the appellant's argument would, I think, lead to so great inconvenience in business, and so much litigation, as to create a greater evil than can arise under the existing law as now settled by your Lordships' judgment.

LORD DAVEY.—I have had an opportunity of reading and considering the opinion which has been delivered by Lord Watson, and I so entirely agree in the conclusion at which he has arrived and the reasons which he has expressed in support of his view, that I have not felt it necessary to write an opinion of my own. I only desire to say that, in my view, our decision in this case is outside Young v. Grote (1). The doctrine of that case was one arising out of the relation of mandant and mandatory, which does not exist in the case of the drawer and holder of a bill of exchange.

GOSLING v. GASKELL AND GROCOTT

Company—Debenture—Receiver—Appointment by trustees—Business carried on by receiver—Agent of company—Winding-up order—Continuance of receiver as manager—Liability of trustees for goods supplied after winding-up order.

A company conveyed all their property to trustees for debenture-holders by a deed which gave the trustees power, in the events which happened, to appoint a receiver who was empowered to carry on the business and was to be the agent of the company. On appointing a receiver the trustees stipulated that he should pay all moneys received into an account at their bank, and that all cheques drawn should be countersigned by the solicitor to the trustees, who was also chairman of the company. An order to wind-up the company was made, and a liquidator was appointed, but he did not interfere in any way with the business, which was still carried on by the receiver. In an action against the trustees by suppliers for the price of goods supplied on the order of the receiver after the date of the winding-up order.

Held: at the date of his appointment the receiver, although appointed by the trustees on behalf of the debenture-holders, was the agent of the company; his position was not altered by the order for the winding-up of the company; and, therefore, he never became the agent of the trustees so as to render them liable as principals for the price of the goods.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Parker, M.R., and Lords L.J., RIGBY, L.J., dissenting), reported [1896] 1 Q.B. 669, affirming a decision of LORD RUSSELL, C.J., in a case tried by him without a jury.

Prior to the month of May, 1892, a company designated Poole and Wright, Ltd., were carrying on business as makers of electrical instruments, and had raised £7,000 by mortgage debentures charged upon the lands and property of the company. On May 18, 1892, they borrowed a further sum of £3,000 from Messrs. Goslings and Sharpe, in respect of which debentures were to be issued, and by a deed of that date all the land and property and all the business and undertaking of the company were conveyed to the present appellant and William Cunliffe Gosling, since deceased (two of the partners in Goslings and Sharpe), by way of second mortgage, as trustees for the second debenture-holders. By cl. 13 of this deed it was provided that, if the trustees should certify that in their opinion the security thereby given was endangered, they might, by writing under their hands, appoint a receiver of the mortgaged premises, and might, from time to time, remove any such receiver and appoint a new receiver in his place. It was further provided that any person so appointed should be the agent of the company, who alone should be liable for his acts and defaults. The deed empowered the receiver, with the consent of the trustees, inter alia to carry on the business of the company, and for that purpose to use the mortgaged premises, to purchase stock-in-trade, and generally to use and deal with the mortgaged premises as the company might have done before such appointment. On June 22, 1892, the security not having then become enforceable, the trustees certified that, in their opinion, the security was endangered, and appointed William John Kelly, the then secretary of the company, receiver. The appointment purported to be made by the trustees in pursuance of the power in that behalf vested in them by the indenture already referred to. The instrument appointing the receiver contained a proviso in these terms:

“Provided that such receiver shall forthwith open an account in his name as receiver at the bank of Messrs. Goslings and Sharpe, and that his receipt for any moneys to be received by him as such receiver as aforesaid shall, in order to discharge the persons paying such money, be countersigned by John Tryon [solicitor to the trustees], and that all moneys so received shall, on the day of their receipt, be paid into the said account as aforesaid, and that the said bank shall not honour any cheques drawn upon the said account by him unless the same shall be countersigned by the said John Tryon.”

Immediately after his appointment Kelly, as such receiver, commenced carrying on the business of the company, and continued to carry it on until February, 1895, when the first debenture-holders displaced Kelly as receiver and put an end to the carrying on of the business. All orders for goods given by Kelly were signed “Poole and White, Ltd.; W. J. Kelly, receiver.” On Sept. 1, 1892, a petition was presented for the compulsory winding-up of the company, and a winding-up order was made on Sept. 14. The official receiver thereupon became liquidator of the company until displaced by the appointment of a Mr. Wilding as liquidator. The liquidator did not take possession of the assets of the company or interfere in the carrying on of the business. Between Dec. 5, 1893, and Jan. 31, 1895, goods were supplied by the respondents upon the order of Kelly, given in the form above mentioned, and the present action was brought by them to recover the price of these goods. LORD RUSSELL, C.J., gave judgment for the respondents, and his judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, RIGBY, L.J., dissenting. The defendant appealed to the House of Lords.

July 27, 1897. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I am of opinion that this case is governed by authority. Cox v. Hickman (1) appears to me expressly in point. Before that case was decided, I could have well understood the arguments presented to your Lordships on this appeal on the part of the respondents; but it appears to me to be too late to take up the position which was then very plausibly occupied. The facts in this case are complicated to some extent by one of the parties being a company, but in truth there is nothing in that circumstance which can alter the application of the law.

A company called Poole and White, Ltd., had borrowed a large sum of money upon a mortgage of the whole property of the company to certain trustees who, among other powers given to them, were entitled to enter into possession of the property mortgaged for the purpose of paying to certain debenture-holders the loan and handing over to the company whatever should remain after the debt and the sums due upon debentures had been paid. In the events which happened the trustees, in pursuance of this power, entered into possession, and in pursuance of the same power, appointed a receiver to take possession of the property, and to carry on the business of the company. Some months after the date of the mortgage Mr. Kelly, the receiver so appointed, was put into possession of the property mortgaged, and for a period of between two and three years he carried on the business of the company. If during the period of so carrying on the business of the company Mr. Kelly or the trustees had been personally sued, the exact question which arose in Cox v. Hickman (1) would have arisen, and, though I shall proceed to discuss what happened afterwards, I believe that the statement might stop there so far as the decision of the present case is concerned.

It is the fact that Mr. Kelly on behalf of the trustees, ordered goods and incurred liabilities on behalf of some one in the conduct of the business, and I could well understand that, but for Cox v. Hickman (1), it might very reasonably have been argued that the trustees here, like the creditors and their agent there, were carrying on a business for their own profit, and the agency, such as it was, might well have been held to bind the persons entering into these trading operations as partners in the business. As BLACKBURN, J., in that case said (8 H.L.Cas. at p. 284), it was very reasonable that those sought to be charged in Cox v. Hickman (1) had authorised the managers of the business that was being carried on to bind them, as it was

“an incident attached by law to a participation in the profits that such authority is given to those managing the concern.”

What LORD CRANWORTH says seems to me to be the answer to the argument in that case, as it is the answer to the argument here. His Lordship says (ibid. at pp. 306, 307):

“It seems to me to follow that the mere concurrence of creditors in an arrangement under which they permit their debtor, or trustees for their debtor, to continue his trade, applying the profits in discharge of their demands, does not make them partners with their debtor, or the trustees. The debtor is still the person solely interested in the profits, save only that he has mortgaged them to his creditors. He receives the benefit of the profits as they accrue, though he has precluded himself from applying them to any other purpose than the discharge of his debts. The trade is not carried on by or on account of the creditors, though their consent is necessary in such a case, for without it all the property might be seized by them in execution. But the trade still remains the trade of the debtor or his trustees; the debtor or the trustees are the persons by or on behalf of whom it is carried on.”

This is the principle, and I am wholly unable to distinguish the reasoning of the noble and learned lord from the propositions of law that are applicable to this case. After the period of Mr. Kelly's management an order was made for winding-up the company under the provisions of the Companies Acts, and no difference was made in the management of the business or in the mode in which it was carried on after that order was made. For some reason or another, which I have not been able to follow, it is apparently assumed that, immediately on the winding-up order. Mr. Kelly, who, it is assumed, had been up to that time the agent for the company (as indeed he was so described, and as by the terms of the mortgage deed he was bound to be), suddenly became the agent of the trustees. That no new authority was in fact given to Mr. Kelly is admitted, but why the making of the order to wind-up the company should suddenly convert Mr. Kelly—who was there as the agent of the company—into the agent of the trustees, is a problem that I have not been able to solve.

There is a circumstance which appears to me to be absolutely irrelevant, but, as it is relied on, it is proper to notice it—namely, that one of the conditions on which the security should become enforceable, and under which it was enforced, was that, if, in the opinion of the trustees, the security should become endangered, they—the trustees—should appoint a receiver, and that when they had appointed a receiver, that receiver was to open an account with the bank in which the trustees themselves were partners, and all moneys received by the receiver appointed must immediately be paid into that bank, and when cheques were drawn by him on the account so created, a Mr. Tryon, the solicitor for the trustees, was to countersign the cheques. Mr. Tryon was chairman of the company. As I have said, this fact is irrelevant. The fact of the trustees keeping a check upon the mode in which the produce of the trade was dealt with (which was all that was done by this provision) appears to me to reflect no light whatever on the relation of the trustees to outside creditors, who were supplying goods to the receiver of Poole and White, Ltd. A B

As I have pointed out before, but for Cox v. Hickman (1) it might well have been argued that the trustees, though called trustees in the deed, were really managers, and, as far as the management of the concern went, the mere agents of the creditors, who had the entire control over them, and as CROMPTON, J., in Cox v. Hickman (1) actually asked (8 H.L.Cas. at pp. 291, 292): C

“In what then, does the present case differ from that of ten persons setting up a new business in the names of two or three managers, they having to divide all the profits? The present case, indeed, is not even one of a trading in the names of the managers, but in a name which may comprehend any partners, and the clause of the deed so much relied on by the plaintiffs in error, which stipulates that they shall carry it on in the name of the Stanton Iron Co., must surely be quite inoperative as to any limitation of the liability to such persons when the rule of law is so well recognised that no agreement amongst partners can prevent the liability to third persons arising from the participation of profits. I can see no hardship under this particular deed in the creditors, who are to have the profits, being liable for the funds and goods from which the profits are to be made, except the general hardship of large liability from small investments, attempted to be remedied by the Limited Liability Acts.” D E

The answer is one which I have already quoted from LORD CRANWORTH, and if I were to substitute the word “company” for the word “debtor” in LORD CRANWORTH’S language, every word of that very learned judge’s observations would be applicable in this case. The company is still the person solely interested in the profits, save only that it has mortgaged them to its creditors. It receives the benefits of the profits as they accrue, though it has precluded itself from applying them to any other purpose than the discharge of its debts. The trade is not carried on by, or on account of, the creditors, though their consent is necessary in such a case, but the trade still remains the trade of the company. The company is the person by, or on whose behalf, the business is carried on. I am not able to understand in what way the winding-up order is supposed to have affected the persons now sued. I am not aware that there is anything in proof which shows that they accepted any other liability than that which they had already incurred, whatever that liability was. No specific act of adoption of any order given subsequently to the winding-up is even suggested. If the agent was acting under a misapprehension that he could still have the authority of the company to carry on the trade it would not make those who originally appointed him in pursuance of the powers of the deed liable for his acts. They appointed him, as they were entitled to appoint him, under the express powers of the deed, and, if the argument addressed to your Lordships were to prevail, that the authority of the company can no longer be invoked to sanction the trading, inasmuch as his power to trade with the company had ceased with the winding-up order, it could not operate to involve the trustees in a new liability without their knowledge. It could not be said that they were the real proprietors of the business even if—as two of the learned judges say—the company had ceased to exist. It was not, and it never could be, their business. Anything that their authorised trading had procured in the way of profit would not have belonged to them; but though, even if unauthorised, it was carried on ostensibly for and on behalf of the company, and if they neither professed to be the principals, nor were in fact the principals, I do not understand how they can be made principals. F G H I

A Under the circumstances, I am of opinion that the judgments of the courts below were wrong, and I think this appeal ought to be allowed, and the respondents ought to be made to pay the costs both here and below.

B LORD WATSON stated the facts and continued: This action was brought by the respondents against both trustees under the indenture of May 18, 1892 (one of whom, the late William Cunliffe Gosling, died before service of the writ), for the sum of £448 9s. 3d., being the balance still unpaid of the price of goods supplied at various times to Mr. Kelly in his capacity of receiver for Poole and White, Ltd., between Dec. 5, 1893, and Jan. 31, 1895. They have obtained judgment against the appellant for that amount with costs. It is not part of the respondents' case, and it was not maintained by their counsel at your Lordships' Bar, that the appellant and his co-trustee were either real or ostensible partners of the concern carried on by Mr. Kelly as receiver of Poole and White, Ltd. Their sole contention, which succeeded in both courts below, was that the relations established between them and the receiver whom they appointed, professedly under the power conferred upon them by the indenture, were such that they must, in law, be held, if not before, at least after the liquidation order, to have given authority to Mr. Kelly to purchase goods for the purpose of carrying on the business, and that, the purchase of the goods in question having been within the scope of that authority, the appellant and his co-trustee were conjointly and severally responsible for their price.

D In view of that argument, it appears to me to be expedient to consider separately the legal position of the trustees before and after the liquidation of the company, especially seeing that their liability during those two periods was rested upon different considerations. If, before the order, the trustees had given the receiver authority to pledge their credit, cadit quæstio. If they had not, the question still remains whether they subsequently gave him such authority. Neither of these questions involves any controversy of fact. Every fact in the case, whether relevant or not, has been made matter of mutual admission; and, to my apprehension, the only matter which your Lordships have to determine is, whether the admitted facts, which I have stated in so far as they were represented to be material, are in law sufficient to sustain the inference that such authority was given.

F I think that it would be impossible to affirm that any liability attached to the trustees during the earlier of these periods, unless your Lordships were prepared to ignore or reverse the doctrine approved and applied by this House on Cox v. Hickman (1), and followed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in G Mollwo, March, and Co. v. Court of Wards (2). In Cox v. Hickman (1) a firm of ironmasters trading as B. Smith & Son, being unable to meet their obligations, entered into a deed of arrangement with their creditors, by which the whole business of the firm was assigned to certain of the creditors as trustees, to be carried on by them under the name of "The Stanton Iron Co." Provision was made for meetings of the creditors, at which the majority in value present were to have the power to make rules as to the mode of conducting the business, or to order the discontinuance of it. The purposes of the trust were to distribute the net income of the business rateably among the creditors of the firm, which net income was always to be deemed the property of the firm of B. Smith & Son, for whom the trustees were to hold the trust estates when all the debts were paid. The trustees, in the course of their management, bought goods of Hickman, and accepted bills to him for the price "per proc. The Stanton Iron Co." The object of the action was to make two of the creditors, who were parties to the deed of arrangement but were not trustees, personally liable for the amount of these bills. The learned judges of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and also the judges who attended the House, were equally divided in opinion; but the four noble and learned Lords who constituted the House were unanimous in holding that these creditors were not made partners of the Stanton Iron Co. by the provisions of the deed of arrangement, and that there were no grounds for inferring that they had given authority to the trustees to pledge their credit for goods purchased in the course of carrying on the business. A

In the present case the business was carried on by a receiver, who was, until it went into liquidation, the agent of the company; and the trustees upon whom it is now sought to impose liability, had no power either to conduct the business or to control the receiver in its management, and never attempted to do either the one of the other of these things. I have had difficulty in speculating upon what principle the Lord Chief Justice, who makes no reference to Cox v. Hickman (1), arrived at the conclusion that, consistently with the principle of that decision, the appellant could be held to have given authority to Mr. Kelly to pledge his credit to the respondents. Unfortunately, his Lordship, after expressing an opinion to that effect, indicates that he did not consider it necessary to give his reasons, probably because he was also of opinion that the appellant had, at all events, given such authority at the time when the goods, the price of which is in question, were purchased by the receiver. In the Court of Appeal LORD ESHER, M.R., took the same view in regard to the liability of the appellant before the liquidation, and has assigned his reasons. His Lordship regarded the proviso inserted in Mr. Kelly's appointment, requiring him to open a bank account, and to make daily payments into it of the receipts of the business, and also that his cheques should be countersigned by Mr. Tryon, as introducing conditions which not only were in excess of the power of appointment conferred upon the trustees by the indenture of May 18, 1892, but conditions which gave the trustees control over the management of the receiver. B C D

I am unable to assent to either of these propositions. Both conditions appear to me to have been reasonable checks imposed upon the agent of the company, for whose acts and defaults the company alone was liable, in the interest of the company itself. Then as to the power of controlling the management of the receiver, which the trustees are supposed to have derived from the fact that Mr. Tryon was selected to countersign his cheques, LORD ESHER observed that the receiver ought not to have been put in the position of ordering goods, E

"and then having to say to the tradesmen who supplied them that he could not pay for them because those who appointed them had reserved control over all such payments themselves." F

That reasoning ignores the fact that Mr. Tryon was not only solicitor for the trustees but chairman of the company and holder of the third issue of debentures, and that in these latter capacities he had a material interest in the success of the business carried on by the receiver, and, therefore, an interest in seeing that its receipts were properly applied in extinction of its current liabilities. He had no right whatever to refuse to countersign cheques drawn in payment of goods actually purchased; his only function was to satisfy himself before countersigning, that the cheque represented a real transaction by the receiver. It must also be kept in view that the company acquiesced in the terms of the appointment as made by the trustees, and on that footing transferred its assets and the conduct of its business to Mr. Kelly, and that circumstance, in my opinion, affords a conclusive answer to the suggestion that the addition of these provisos, which constituted a mere check to prevent any improper application of the receipts of the business, and gave neither Mr. Tryon nor anyone else power to control the course of its management by the receiver, were in excess of the power to appoint him conferred by the company upon the trustees for the second debenture-holders. The provisos must, in these circumstances, be treated on the same footing as if they had been expressed at length in the indenture of May 18, 1892. G H I

The Lord Chief Justice, the Master of the Rolls, and also LOPES, L.J., who held that the appellant would not have been liable for goods bought by the receiver before the liquidation order, were all of opinion that, whether the trustees were or were not responsible for the receiver's purchases before the event, they became so liable upon its occurrence. I am unable to follow the reasoning by which these learned judges have arrived at that result. The Lord Chief Justice says that the company qua company, then "ceased to have any real actual existence at all as a going or trading concern," and that the liquidator took no part, direct or indirect, in the carrying on of its business by Mr. Kelly. LOPES, L.J., says that

"from the date of Mr. Wilding's appointment as liquidator the company ceased to exist as a going concern."

These statements are approximately correct. The company, when in liquidation, although by no means defunct, could no longer act by its directors, and appoint or employ agents capable of binding the corporation or its estate, and was represented by the liquidator, who could not himself carry on its business without the special leave of the court. But the radical right to the business continued to be an asset of the company; and if it had been so successful under the management of Mr. Kelly as to yield profit sufficient to meet the claims of debenture-holders, who had no interest beyond that of mortgagees, it would, no doubt, have been at once reclaimed by the liquidator for the behoof of the general creditors. In point of fact the management of the receiver appears to have been so far successful that neither the first debenture-holders, nor the liquidator, seem to have thought it expedient to disturb it.

None of these circumstances appears to me to be sufficient to afford a solution of the question which your Lordships have to decide. If I had been of opinion that the trustees for the second debenture-holders stood in the relation of principals to Mr. Kelly before the liquidation, I should not have hesitated to hold that such relation was not altered by the supervening incapacity of the company to act by, or incur any obligation through, an agent. But not being of that opinion, I am at a loss to understand upon what principle the trustees of the debenture-holders became subrogated as principals, in room and stead of the company, as soon as it incurred a statutory incapacity to occupy that position. The reasoning of the learned judges who were adverse to the appellant appears to me to involve this proposition, which, to my mind, is fallacious, that in cases where an individual, acting under a power of attorney or similar warrant, appoints an agent for a company, he necessarily becomes the principal of that agent, whenever the company ceases to be legally capable of imparting any authority to the agent, if the agent, without obtaining any new authority from him, chooses to continue his management.

Apart from that general and doubtful proposition, it was admitted by the respondents' counsel that, after liquidation, nothing occurred which could alter the relation in which the appellant and his co-trustee stood to Mr. Kelly, the receiver, with the single exception of the fact that, from and after September, 1893, the counter-signature of Mr. Tryon to the cheques passed upon his bank account by the receiver, was discontinued. It was curious to observe that the respondents' counsel, who strenuously maintained the view of the Master of the Rolls, that the observance of that condition was sufficient to make the trustee liable before liquidation, were driven to argue, with equal vigour, that its non-observance, after liquidation, at the time when their clients sold goods to the receiver, was attended with the same legal result. In point of fact it does not appear by whom, or under what authority that check was removed; but, assuming its removal to have been sanctioned by the trustees, it appears to me that the circumstances could not of itself, or in combination with the other features of this case, have the effect of transforming the trustees into principals of the receiver.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed, with costs to the appellant here, and in both courts below.

LORD HERSCHELL stated the facts as set out ante p. 301 and continued: The question in the case was, in the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice, one of fact, and not of law at all. But the facts were not in dispute. The goods were ordered by Kelly, and not by the appellant and his co-trustees. They certainly gave Kelly no express authority to purchase for them, nor did they expressly appoint Kelly to act as their agent in carrying on their business, or indeed to act as their agent at all, or to pledge their credit. If, then, they are liable to pay for the goods, it must be because in the circumstances which I have detailed, and notwithstanding the facts to which I have just referred, the law made them Kelly's principals, and imposed such liability upon them. Though the Lord Chief Justice did not decide the point, he indicated the impression, at least, that from the outset Kelly was carrying on the business, not for the company, but for the appellant and his co-trustee, and that, from the time when he was appointed receiver, they and not the company were the principals. The Master of the Rolls, while agreeing with the Lord Chief Justice that it was not necessary to decide the point, expressed a distinct opinion that Kelly was appointed, not such a receiver as was contemplated by the contract, but as agent for the trustees.

Though it may not be essential, I think it very important to determine in what capacity Kelly originally acted, and whose agent he was. For so far as he and those with whom he dealt were concerned, he carried on the business in precisely the same manner from the beginning to the end. He gave the orders in the same form. He received in terms no new authority. If the trustees were originally his principals, no doubt they continued so to the end. If, on the other hand, the company were at the outset the principals, it will be necessary to inquire whether there were any acts done by the trustees which, in the absence of an express authority to act for them, made Kelly their agent to purchase goods, or generally to carry on the business. It is to be observed that at the time when Kelly was appointed receiver the trustees had no power to interfere with the company in the conduct of their business except by appointing a receiver under cl. 13 of the deed of May 18, 1892. The security was not then enforceable; they had no power to enter into possession of the mortgaged premises.

Apart, then, from the proviso to be found at the end of the instrument appointing Kelly receiver, I do not think that it could be doubted that he was duly appointed receiver for the company, and that the company and not the trustees was alone liable for his acts and defaults. Mortgage deeds frequently empower the mortgagee to appoint a receiver for the mortgagor. What, then, was the effect of the added proviso? The Master of the Rolls regarded it as depriving the receiver of the freedom ordinarily incident to his position, and reserving to the trustees a control over him with regard to every step which he might take. I cannot so view it. Its object seems to me clear. I do not think that it was intended to reserve to the trustees any control over the management of the business, but only to act as a check to prevent any improper use by the receiver of the moneys of the company, and to ensure that they should be properly applied. Mr. Tryon, by whom the cheques were to be countersigned, was, it is true, solicitor to the trustees, but he was also the chairman of the company. His function was merely to see that the cheques were drawn for payment of the company's liabilities. But, even assuming that the company would have been entitled to refuse to let Kelly occupy the position of receiver for the company on the ground that the terms of his appointment were not such as were warranted by the deed of May, 1892, they did not do so. They allowed him from the date of his appointment to conduct their business as a receiver appointed under that deed. If the proviso introduced a check upon the acts of the receiver which the deed did not authorise, it was quite competent for the company to assent to and sanction the introduction of that check. And one can well understand that the company would regard it as in their interest, and would desire that there should be such a check upon the action of the receiver.

I cannot myself entertain any doubt that when Kelly took over the management of the business under his appointment, he did so with the full assent of the company and as receiver for them. Supposing that before they went into liquidation an action had been brought against them for the price of goods ordered by Kelly, what answer would they have had? Could they possibly have maintained that he was not receiver for them, but for the trustees, when the trustees had at the time no power to appoint a receiver, except for the company, and when the company had recognised his appointment and permitted him to act as receiver? I cannot think so. As soon as the order was made for the winding-up of the company it became, as from the date of the petition, incapable of entering into contracts without the sanction of the court. The contracts made by Kelly after that date certainly did not bind the company. They could not be principals in those contracts. The reasoning which led to the conclusion in favour of the respondents appears to have been this: that after the winding-up order the company could no longer be principals; that Kelly, who contracted in the same terms as before, was not liable upon the contracts as principal: that the appellant and his co-trustee were aware that the company were no longer principals; that they permitted Kelly to carry on business as before when they could at any time have displaced him; that the business was really being carried on for them; and that, therefore, they are liable as principals on Kelly's contracts.

It is clear that after the winding-up order the appellant and his co-trustee did not in terms give Kelly any new authority. They did not interfere in any way. He carried on the business afterwards just as he had done before. They did not expressly authorise him to enter into any contracts, or to carry on the business on their behalf. If, then, they are liable as principals it must be because an authority to do so is to be implied from the circumstances. I have to observe, in the first place, that even if Kelly could not be made liable on the contracts, and if the company could not be treated as his principals, it by no means follows, in my opinion, that there must be some other principal. Where an agent purports to contract for another in such terms as not to make himself a contracting party, and he has no authority from that other to bind him as principal, neither the agent nor anyone else can be sued on the contract, though the agent may be subject to the same liability as if he had been a party to the contract in respect of his breach of an implied warranty that he possessed the authority which he represented himself to have.

If, then, neither Kelly nor the company is liable on the contract this does not show that someone else must be, or go a step towards proving that the appellant and his co-trustee were the principals. It is not necessary to decide whether Kelly could be made liable for the price of the goods. It is said that the appellant and his co-trustee might have displaced Kelly, and so put an end to his carrying on of the business. This is true. But the holders of the first mortgage might equally have taken this step, as indeed they did at a later date. This non-interference by the appellant and his "permitting" Kelly, in this sense, to carry on the business, cannot of itself make Kelly his agent if he was not so otherwise. Kelly was certainly not held out to the world as the agent of the trustees for the second debenture-holders. The respondents knew nothing about them, and did not give credit to them.

The respondents, therefore, can only succeed by showing that the contracts were made on behalf of the appellant and his co-trustee and with their authority. What, then, wrought the change by which Kelly not only ceased to be agent for the company but became the agent of these trustees? I gather that the answer to this question would be that from the date of the winding-up order the business was carried on for the benefit of the trustees. I do not see, however, that it was any more carried on for the benefit of the trustees after that date than before. The profits made by the carrying on of the business of the company, were, before as well as after the winding-up order, part of the security for the payment of the debts due to the debenture-holders, and after as well as prior to the winding-up, the profits of the business, subject to the claim of the mortgagees, belonged to the company. It had not ceased to exist; it could still hold and also acquire property. If the business had proved profitable and the assets of the company had been more than sufficient to discharge the mortgage claims the liquidator of the company could, and doubtless would, have intervened, and applied the surplus to the payment of the creditors of the company, and all that remained after they had been paid would have been the property of the company.

Prior to the decision in Cox v. Hickman (1) in this House, it would, no doubt, have been open to contention that, under the circumstances which existed in this case, the business was being carried on for the benefit of the mortgagees, and must be treated as their business, and that they would, therefore, be liable upon contracts made by the person who carried it on. But since the decision of that case such a proposition can no longer be maintained. I think that the effect of the judgments in Cox v. Hickman (1) has been overlooked in the judgments appealed from. In that case an insolvent firm, by a deed of arrangement with the creditors, assigned their business to certain of the creditors as trustees. These trustees carried on the business under the name of "The Stanton Iron Co." In that name they ordered goods of the plaintiff, and accepted bills for the price. The question in the action was whether the other creditors (two or whom were sued) were liable as principals in the contract? It was contended that they were so, because they were parties to the deed of arrangement by which the net income of the business was to be distributed rateably among the creditors of the firm, and a majority in value of the creditors present at meetings called for the purposes, were empowered to make regulations as to the mode of conducting the business or to order its discontinuance. Notwithstanding these circumstances, this House held the defendants not liable. There the business was being carried on for the benefit of the creditors of the insolvent firm, just as much as it was here carried on for the benefit of the appellant and his co-trustees or those whom they represented. And those creditors as much authorised and permitted it to be carried on in the way it was carried on, as did the appellant and his co-trustee in the present case. Moreover, the persons who conducted the business in the case referred to were subject to a control and interference by the creditors generally, to which there is no parallel in the present case. It appears to me that the plaintiff in Cox v. Hickman (1) had a stronger ground for contending that the defendants were liable than the present respondents have. And I think that it would be impossible to decide in favour of the respondents on the ground that the appellant permitted the business to be carried on for his benefit without overruling the decision of your Lordship's House in that case. I think that the judgment appealed from should be reversed.

LORD MORRIS.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD DAVEY.—Were it not for the judgments delivered in the courts below, I should not have thought that this case presented much difficulty. In my opinion, there can be no doubt that, at the date of his appointment, the receiver, though nominated by the mortgagees, became, both in fact and in law, the agent of the mortgagor, i.e., of the company. That he was so by the express terms of the power under which he was appointed is undisputed. The purpose for which he was appointed was in order to make provision for payment of the company's mortgage debts, which was, in my opinion, a purpose of the company. It is said that certain directions which were given to the receiver, e.g., to open a banking account with Messrs. Goslings and Sharpe, and that his receipts and cheques should be countersigned by Mr. Tryon, were in excess of the power. Perhaps they were; I do not know. But his appointment with these provisions was accepted and acquiesced in by the company, and the directors gave up the custody of the company's property to him, and allowed him to conduct the business as a duly appointed receiver in the manner directed by the terms of his appointment. If the company did not agree, any terms in excess of the power were not binding on the receiver, for it cannot be pretended that there was any intention on the part of the mortgagees to appoint a receiver except under the power, and, indeed, they had no authority at that time to do so. The fact that the mortgagees were to obtain the benefit of the appointment through the payment of their interest or principal, or had the right to exercise certain control over the conduct of the business, would not, of course, make him their agent for the purpose of pledging their credit. One need only refer on this point to the opinions expressed in this House in Cox v. Hickman (1), and the judgment of the Judicial Committee in Mollwo, March & Co. v. Court of Wards (2).

If he was not the agent of the appellant originally, did he become so on the winding-up of the company? I assume that the power to carry on the business so as to pledge the credit of the company and make the company liable to be sued on contracts made by him came to an end. The receiver, however, continued to exercise the power of management, and to carry on the business in the same manner as he had done before the winding-up. He purported to exercise powers which I will assume that he no longer possessed. I forbear to say what may be the legal consequence to himself if he did so. But I am unable to see how, without any act or assent on their part, it made him the agent of persons who, for the purpose of pledging their credit, had not previously conferred that authority on him, and never contemplated or intended doing so, or held themselves out as his principals. I concur with your Lordships in the order proposed.

Negligence—Contractor—Liability of employer for contractor's negligence—Duty of employer to see work properly done—Construction of sewer—Interference with gas main—Escape of gas—Damage to plaintiffs, adjoining householders.

A local authority, acting under statutory powers, employed a contractor to construct a sewer under the highway. The contractor negligently failed to give proper support to a gas main under which he had cut in the course of the carrying out of the works, and in consequence the main sank and broke so that gas escaped into the plaintiffs' house which abutted on the highway and there exploded, causing injury to the female plaintiff and damage to the plaintiffs' furniture. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover damages from the local authority and/or the contractor,

Held: the local authority would not perform the duty which they owed to the plaintiffs by merely constructing a proper sewer; to fulfil that duty they were also bound to see that as a result of the work, which must necessarily be attended by the risk of interfering with gas and other pipes, no breakage of a gas pipe occurred which might lead to injury or damage to the plaintiffs; therefore, the negligence of the contractor could not be said to be collateral to the work, for which the local authority would not be liable, and, the damage not being too remote, the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed.

Application by the plaintiffs for judgment or the new trial of an action tried by WRIGHT, J., with a jury.

The plaintiffs, husband and wife, and tenants and occupiers of a house in Moorfield Place, Idle, in the county of York, brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries to the wife and damage to household furniture, the property of the plaintiffs, which was caused by an explosion of gas. On Oct. 10, 1894, the Idle District Council served a notice, under s. 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, upon the husband requiring him to make a sewer under the road in Moorfield Place near his house. He did not comply with the terms of the notice, and the district council, acting under their statutory powers, proceeded to execute the works. On Dec. 14, 1894, the district council entered into a contract with Abraham Thornton, a contractor, for the construction of the sewer. By an indenture of that date made between Thornton, of the first part, G. Watkinson, his surety, of the second part, and the Idle District Council, therein called the local board, of the third part, it was agreed that, in consideration of the moneys therein mentioned, Thornton should construct any complete the works described in the specification and bill of quantities annexed in all respects in accordance with the specification. The specification contained the following clauses.

"7. The contractor to execute the whole of the work in the most workman-like and substantial manner, particular attention being paid to any directions or instructions of the inspector which may be given by him from time to time as the work proceeds, and if any difference of opinion shall arise as to the description, quality, and quantity of materials or workmanship, or anything relating to the works, the opinion of the inspector shall be final and binding on all parties concerned.

"8. The contractor shall give or provide all necessary personal superintendence during the execution of the works, and shall employ competent foremen to superintend the same during their progress, and should any such foreman or the contractor's workmen at any time disobey the orders of the inspector, or conduct themselves improperly, or be in his opinion incompetent, the inspector shall have full power to discharge them forthwith, and the contractor shall not employ any discharged man on the works again without the permission of the inspector, but shall be bound within three days to replace any person or persons so discharged by others approved by the inspector. The person employed by the contractor to superintend the work shall be competent to carry out the same from the contract drawings, and to obtain therefrom all requisite particulars, as no further information or enlarged details will necessarily be supplied.

"11. The inspector shall have power to stop the works, or any portion thereof, absolutely at any stage, to enlarge, diminish, modify, alter, or vary the works, or any part thereof, and also to alter or vary the description of the materials to be used from time to time, and such alterations shall not annul or invalidate the contract, which shall, nevertheless, remain in full force and effect. Any extension, reduction, alteration, modification, or variation as aforesaid, shall, to all intents and purposes, be deemed and taken as having formed part of the contract. And the price or value of any additions to or deductions from the contract price, consequent thereupon, shall be ascertained and determined by the inspector, whose decision shall be final and binding upon all parties.

"14. The care of the entire works until their completion shall remain with the contractor, who shall be held responsible for all accidents and damage to persons or property arising therefrom from any cause whatsoever, and chargeable for anything that may be stolen, removed, or destroyed. The contractor shall at his own expense protect all walls, buildings, gas-pipes, water-pipes, or other property which may be laid bare or otherwise interfered with, and make good any such property which may be damaged, removed, disturbed, or injured during the progress of the works, or in consequence thereof; and shall also make good all damage occasioned by delay or neglect, or carelessness, deficiency in strutting, fencing, watching, or lighting either to the works or to the buildings, or premises adjoining or near thereto, whether such damage or defects be discovered during the progress of the work, or appear or become known after the completion thereof; and no payment on account of the works, or certificate, or approval of any work by any officer of the local board shall effect or prejudice the rights of the local board against the contractor in this respect. If it shall appear to the inspector that the contractor has failed with all practicable despatch to make good or to pay and satisfy the expense of making good, the said several matters and things hereinbefore referred to, or any portion of them, the local board shall have power to make good the same or any of them, at the expense of the contractor, and the expense of making good the same and incident thereto shall (without prejudice to any other remedy) be deducted from the moneys due or to become due to the contractor under his contract or shall be paid by the contractor to the local board. In case of any claim, action, suit, or proceedings being brought or taken against the local board or any of their officers or servants, in respect of any loss, damage, or injury caused by the works, or consequent thereupon, the contractor or his sureties shall fully indemnify them and each of them therefrom, and forthwith pay to him or them all costs, charges, damages, and expenses which he or they shall have been put to or have incurred in reference thereto, and the local board may, if they shall see fit, compromise any such action, suit, or other proceedings, or any clause in respect of any such damage as aforesaid on such terms as they shall think proper; and the contractor shall thereupon repay the sum or sums thus paid by the local board. The local board shall not be liable to, for, or in respect of any damages or compensation, or claim therefor, under the Employers' Liability Act, 1890, or any Act amending the same, because, or by reason, or in consequence of, any accidents to workmen or others in the employment of the contractor or of any acting under him or on his behalf, and the contractor shall save the local board harmless thereof, and of any and all costs and expenses consequent thereon.

"32. In all trenches and excavations requiring refilling after the introduction of the structural works, the softest materials free from stones must be chosen, especially for covering the sanitary pipes, and a layer not less than six inches thick must first be put in and well pounded, particularly at the sides; the succeeding layers may be put in nine inches thick, each layer to be well pounded; there shall be used one pounder of every spade or shovel, and the inspector may have it watered as well as pounded if he considers necessary. The surplus material must be carted away to a place which will be provided by the board; nothing of value will be allowed to be carted away or disposed of by way of sale or for a profit from private property, and anything of value resulting from the trenches or excavations made in the public highways, or on property over which the board have jurisdiction, shall be deemed to be the property of the local board, and may only be disposed of under the special written consent of the board.

"45. Where gas or water pipes are found in the line of the sewer, care shall be taken that no breakages occur. Where needful the contractor shall place strong timbers across the trench and sling the gas or water pipes to them by wrought iron chains of sufficient strength."

Under the terms of this contract, Thornton proceeded to construct the sewer under the road in Moorfield Place. The sewer passed in a slanting direction underneath a gas main, and for the purpose of its construction it was necessary to take away the soil from underneath a considerable length of this main which was supported while the sewer was being constructed by four props. The soil was then put back under the gas main and the road restored to its former condition. By the end of January, 1895, the works were completed, but the soil underneath the gas main was so negligently packed that the pipe sank and cracked, the gas which escaped from it penetrated into the cellar of the plaintiffs' house, and, on Mar. 16, 1895, the gas exploded in the plaintiffs' house, and caused the damage which was the subject of the action. At the trial of the action before WRIGHT, J., the jury assessed the damages at £45 and the learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs for that amount against Thornton, but he ordered judgment to be entered for the Idle District Council on the ground that the accident was caused by an independent contractor for which the district council was not responsible, there being no evidence of any negligence on their part. The plaintiffs now moved for judgment against the Idle District Council or for a new trial.

Feb. 17, 1896. The following judgments were read.

LINDLEY, L.J., stated the facts, read cl. 7, 8, 11, 14, 32, 45, and 46 of the specification of the contract between the Idle District Council and Thornton, referred to the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 150 and 160, and to the Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847, ss. 22 and 79, and continued: The powers of the district council, under the Public Health Act, 1875, can only be exercised by some person or persons acting under their authority. Those persons may be servants of the district council or they may not. The district council are not bound in point of law to do the work themselves, i.e., by servants of their own. There is nothing to prevent the district council from employing a contractor to do their work for them. But the district council cannot, by employing a contractor, get rid of their own duty to other people, whatever such duty may be. If the contractor performs their duty for them, it is performed by them through him, and they are not responsible for anything more. They are not responsible for his negligence in other respects as they would be if he was their servant. Such negligence is sometimes called casual or collateral negligence. If, on the other hand, their contractor fails to do what it is their duty to do, or to get done, their duty is not performed, and they are responsible accordingly.

This principle lies at the root of the modern decisions on the subject, and the distinction between the two classes of cases is well illustrated by comparing Reedie v. London and North Western Rail. Co. (1) with Hole v. Sittingbourne and Sheerness Rail. Co. (2). In the first of these cases the defendants employed a contractor to build a bridge. One of his men carelessly let a stone fall on the plaintiff, and the defendants were held not liable. In the second of these cases the defendants' duty was to build a bridge which would open and let vessels pass. They employed a contractor, who built a bridge which would not open. The plaintiff was injured thereby, and the defendants were held liable for the consequences. The principle to which I am referring is further illustrated by Pickard v. Smith (3), the coal-cellar case; and in Gray v. Pullen (4), where the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reversing the Court of Queen's Bench, held the employer of a contractor liable for injury caused to the plaintiff by the contractor's failure to make good a pavement under which he had constructed a drain. BLACKBURN, J., at the trial, and the Court of Queen's Bench, held the defendant not liable on the ground that he was not responsible for the negligence of the contractor in doing the work. But on appeal it was held that it was the defendant's duty to fill up the drain, or to see that it was filled up, and that he was liable for the non-performance of this duty. LORD CHELMSFORD, in Wilson v. Merry (5) (L.R. 1 Sc. & Div. at p. 341), expressed doubt as to the correctness of this decision, but I cannot find that it has ever been overruled or considered unsatisfactory by any other judge.

The same principle was again applied in Tarry v. Ashton (6), the case of the lamp on the defendant's property which fell on the plaintiff while passing under it. So again in Bower v. Peate (7), Dalton v. Angus (8) (6 App. Cas. at p. 829), and Hughes

v. Percival (9), in all of which the defendants' contractor let down the plaintiff's wall. In each of these cases the defendant was held responsible because it was his duty not to let the wall down and to take whatever care was necessary to prevent injury from what he was doing. Black v. Christchurch Finance Co., Ltd. (10), in the Privy Council, is the last case on the subject, and there a landowner who had employed a contractor to burn the bush on his land was held liable for his negligence in burning it so as to be unable to stop the spread of the fire to the land of the plaintiff.

It is not always easy to avoid mistakes in applying this or any other principle to difficult cases, as is shown by Gray v. Pullen (4) and Butler v. Hunter (11), which is inconsistent with Bower v. Peate (7), and was distinctly disapproved in Hughes v. Percival (9). Neither is it easy to express the principle in terms which will apply to all cases, as is shown by LORD BLACKBURN's criticisms in Hughes v. Percival (9) when referring to Bower v. Peate (7) and Quarman v. Burnett (12), the well-known jobmaster's case. I will take the law as laid down by LORD BLACKBURN in Dalton v. Angus (8). LORD BLACKBURN there said (6 App. Cas. at p. 829):

"Ever since Quarman v. Burnett it has been considered settled law that one employing another is not liable for his collateral negligence unless the relation of master and servant existed between them. So that a person employing a contractor to do work is not liable for the negligence of that contractor or his servants. On the other hand, a person causing something to be done, the doing of which casts on him a duty, cannot escape from the responsibility attaching on him of seeing that duty performed, by delegating it to a contractor. He may bargain with the contractor that he shall perform the duty and stipulate for an indemnity from him if it is not performed, but he cannot thereby relieve himself from liability to those injured by the failure to perform it: Hole v. Sittingbourne and Sheerness Rail. Co. (2); Pickard v. Smith (3); Tarry v. Ashton (6)."

LORD BLACKBURN, in this passage, contrasts a contractor's negligence, which he calls collateral, with failure on the part of a contractor to perform the duty of his employer. For the first the employer is not liable. For the second he is, whether the failure is attributable to negligence or not. LORD BLACKBURN's language in Hughes v. Percival (9) (8 App. Cas. at p. 446) shows that this is really what he meant, for he points out that the employer's duty was to see that his contractor did his work properly. LORD WATSON said the same.

I pass now to consider the duty of the defendants in the present case. Their duty in sewerage the street was not performed by constructing a proper sewer. Their duty was not only to do that, but also to take care not to break any gas-pipes which they cut under. This involved properly supporting them. This duty was not performed. They employed a contractor to perform their duty for them, but he failed to do so. It is impossible, I think, to regard this as a case of collateral negligence. The case is not one in which the contractor performed the defendants' duty for them, but did so carelessly. The case is one in which the duty of the defendants, so far as the gas-pipes were concerned, was not performed at all. It, therefore, falls within the second of LORD BLACKBURN's propositions and not within the first. It was contended for the defendants that, although they might be liable to the owner of the gas-pipes, they were not liable to the plaintiffs as they were under no duty to them. But this is not consistent with Gray v. Pullen (4) nor with Tarry v. Ashton (6) in neither of which was the defendant under any duty to the plaintiff except as one of the public.

On these grounds I am of opinion that the defendants, the Idle District Council, are liable to the plaintiffs. Counsel for the plaintiffs contended that the relation of the council to Thornton was that of master and servant. Of course, if this were so, the liability of the defendants would be clear enough. But I am not prepared to decide the case on this ground. It is not proved that the surveyor gave orders which led to the mischief; and large as his powers were, Thornton was not, in my opinion, the servant of the defendants. Reedie v. London and North Western Rail. Co. (1) and Steel v. South-Eastern Rail. Co. (13) support this conclusion. With respect to the remoteness of damage little need be said. The nature of gas, its certainty to escape and to find its way wherever it can get, and to explode if it escapes in large quantities and comes into contact with fire, all render the breaking of a gas main very dangerous if houses are near. The fact moreover that free escape upwards through the surface of the road was greatly hindered by the hardness of the surface after it was left by the contractor, would force the gas laterally to some considerable distance and very probably into some passage or place near a fire. Such an accident as that which actually happened is only what might have been reasonably expected. Sharp v. Powell (14) does not, therefore, apply to the present case. The appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the plaintiffs for £45 and the costs of the action, and the defendants must pay the costs of the appeal.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., stated the facts and the relevant provisions of the contract between the council and Thornton and continued: To render a person liable for an act of negligence which he did not himself commit, it must be shown by the person injured either that the person sought to be made liable authorised the act of negligence complained of, or that it was committed by his servant in the course of his employment, or that he owed such a duty to the person injured that he could not by delegating its performance to a contractor rid himself of that duty. I pass by a liability which may be imposed upon an owner or occupier of land for injury to another occasioned by the user of his land, which will be found referred to by PARKE, B., in his judgment in Rapson v. Cubitt (15) (9 M. & W. at p. 714).

It was not contended at the Bar that this liability had any application to the case in hand, and, indeed, if it had, it would impose a very onerous obligation upon local authorities which, as far as I know, has never before been attempted to be imposed upon them when executing works by their contractor in a public street. In the present case, in my judgment, the relationship of master and servant did not exist between the council and Thornton, for the true relationship was that of principal and contractor. It is true that the district council by their inspector had the right of fully superintending and supervising the execution of the works and giving directions thereon, but Steel v. South-Eastern Rail. Co. (13) and Reedie v. London and North Western Rail. Co. (1) show that these circumstances do not of themselves render a principal liable for the negligent act of his contractor unless brought about by the order of the inspector. If the fracture of the gas-pipe in this case had been caused by reason of the orders of the district council's inspector, that would have rendered the district council liable, for, as between the district council and the inspector, the relationship of master and servant existed, and for his acts within the scope of his employment the council would be liable; but no proof was given that the fracture was occasioned by anything that the inspector either said or did. If the inspector was guilty of any negligent omission, that was a breach of a duty which he owed to his employers, not to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs have not shown that the district council authorised the act of negligence complained of, nor that the contractor stood to them in the relation of servant to master; but the important question still remains, whether the plaintiffs have not shown that the district council owed such a duty towards them, that the council could not, by delegating that duty to a contractor, thereby escape liability thereunder should the contractor be guilty of negligence in the performance of the work he had contracted to execute. In Dalton v. Angus (8) LORD BLACKBURN states the law applicable to a case like the present thus. He said (6 App. Cas. at p. 829):

ing a contractor to do work is not liable for the negligence of that contractor or his servants. On the other hand, a person causing something to be done, the doing of which casts on him a duty, cannot escape from the responsibility attaching on him of seeing that duty performed, by delegating it to a contractor. He may bargain with the contractor that he shall perform the duty and stipulate for an indemnity from him if it is not performed, but he cannot thereby relieve himself from liability to those injured by the failure to perform it."

LORD BLACKBURN, it will be seen, here points to two distinct cases: the one where the cause of action is founded upon the negligence either of the servant acting within the scope of his employment or of a contractor, and the other where it is founded upon a breach of a duty, the performance of which a person could not escape by delegation to another. As illustrations of this duty, I will refer to that class of cases of which Hole v. Sittingbourne and Sheerness Rail. Co. (2), Pickard v. Smith (3), Tarry v. Ashton (6), and Gray v. Pullen (4) in error, are instances, in which it was held that a duty was imposed by law upon the defendant towards the plaintiff as one of the public not to interfere with the right which the plaintiff possessed of using a public way so as to impede or injure him when passing, and also to that class of cases exemplified by Bower v. Peate (7) and Dalton v. Angus (8), in which it was held that a legal duty was imposed upon the defendant towards the plaintiff not to interfere with the right he possessed of having his land supported by that of the defendant. In each of these cases it was held that the defendant was liable to the plaintiff for breach of the duty thus imposed on him, although the act which caused the injury was the act and default of the defendant's contractor and not of the defendant. The ratio decidendi of these cases is that, as the duty was imposed by law upon the defendant, he could not escape this liability by delegating its performance to a contractor, for the obligation imposed upon the defendant was to take the necessary precautions to see that the duty was performed.

If there were no other legal duty upon the district council in the present case than that which appears in the above-mentioned cases, inasmuch as the district council have invaded no right either of transit or of support to which the plaintiffs were antecedently entitled, I should have thought that the plaintiffs would have had difficulty in bringing the district council within these authorities; but this I need not determine, for there is another duty imposed by law upon the district council in the circumstances of the case which, in my judgment, settles the question. LORD WATSON, in Dalton v. Angus (8), states it thus (6 App. Cas. at p. 831):

"When an employer contracts for the performance of work, which properly conducted can occasion no risk to his neighbour's house which he is under obligation to support, he is not liable for damage arising from the negligence of the contractor. But in cases where the work is necessarily attended with risk he cannot free himself from liability by binding the contractor to take effectual precautions. He is bound, as in a question with the party injured, to see that the contract is performed and is therefore liable, as well as the contractor, to repair any damage which may be done."

When the decision in the House of Lords in 1883 in Hughes v. Percival (9) is rightly understood, and the judgment in the Privy Council in Black v. Christchurch Finance Co. (10) is considered, it appears to me clear that in the circumstances of the present case a duty was imposed upon the district council which they could not evade by employing a contractor to do the work. What this duty is was thus formulated by the Queen's Bench Division (COCKFURN, C.J., and MELLOR and FIELD, JJ.) in the year 1876 in Bower v. Peate (7), in which the Lord Chief Justice, delivering the judgment of the court, said as follows (1 Q.B.D. at p. 326):

"The answer to the defendant's contention may, however, as it appears to us, be placed on a broader ground, namely, that a man who orders a work to be executed from which in the natural course of things injurious consequences to his neighbour must be expected to arise, unless means are adopted by which such consequences may be prevented, is bound to see to the doing of that which is necessary to prevent the mischief, and cannot relieve himself of his responsibility by employing someone else—whether it be the contractor employed to do the work from which the danger arises or some independent person—to do what is necessary to prevent the act he has ordered to be done from becoming wrongful.”

It must be noted that, in Hughes v. Percival (9), LORD BLACKBURN doubted whether this duty was not too broadly stated, for he said (8 App Cas. at p. 447):

“If taken in the full sense of the words it would seem to render a person who orders post-horses and a coachman from an inn bound to see that the coachman, though not his servant but that of the innkeeper, uses that skill and care which is necessary when driving the coach to prevent mischief to the passengers.”

It is not for me to criticise this statement of LORD BLACKBURN, but, with all respect, I would point out that it seems to me not to be in the natural course of things to be expected, when a man hires post-horses and a coachman from an innkeeper, unless means are adopted to prevent them, that injurious consequences would arise to his neighbour. In the ordinary course of events in such a case no injuries would occur to anyone. The driver would drive and the hirer ride in the carriage, and in ordinary course the transit would come to an end without injury to anyone. The facts in Hughes v. Percival (9), upon which judgment was given as ascertained by the House of Lords, were these. The defendant had employed a contractor to take down his house, which stood between the plaintiff's house and the house of B., and to erect a new house for him upon the old site. In performing this work the contractor negligently cut into the party wall between the defendant's house and that of B., which caused the defendant's house to fall, and that caused the injury complained of to the plaintiff's house. The question arose whether the defendant was liable to the plaintiff for the negligent act of his contractor. No question of the plaintiff having any right to support from the defendant's house arose in this case. It was held that the defendant was liable upon the ground that the work ordered by the defendant was necessarily attended with risk to the plaintiff's house, and that it was, therefore, the defendant's duty to see that proper precautions were taken to prevent injury to the plaintiff.

LORD BLACKBURN said (8 App. Cas. at p. 447):

“The question is, I think, narrowed to this: Was the operation, during which the defendant's duty required him to see that reasonable care and skill should be used, over at the time when those engaged in the work cut into the party wall between the defendant's house and Barron's.”

LORD WATSON said (ibid. at p. 449):

“The appellant does not deny that many of the operations which he contemplated, and which he had employed a contractor to execute, were such as would necessarily or possibly imperil the stability of the party wall if no precautions were used; nor does he dispute that it was incumbent upon him to see that these operations were safely carried out by the contractor. What he did (by his counsel) allege, and offer to prove before the jury was, that all these hazardous operations had been brought to a safe termination months before the occurrence which resulted in damage to the respondent's house.”

LORD FITZGERALD said (ibid. at p. 455):

“What is the law applicable? What was the defendant's duty? The law has been verging somewhat in the direction of treating parties engaged in such an operation as the defendant's as insurers of their neighbours, or warranting them against injury. It has not, however, reached quite to that point. It does declare that under such a state of circumstances, it was the duty of the defendants to have used every reasonable precaution that care and skill might suggest in the execution of his works, so as to protect his neighbours from injury, and that he cannot get rid of the responsibility thus cast upon him by transferring that duty to another."

The learned Lords, finding as a fact, as indeed the majority of the Court of Appeal had found, that the hazardous operation was not over when the negligent acts of the contractor had taken place, held the defendant liable for this negligent act of the contractor, the defendant not having, therefore, performed his duty to the plaintiff.

The recent case of Black v. Christchurch Finance Co. (10) was decided upon the same principle, and is pertinent to the present case. In that case the plaintiff sued the defendants for damages by reason of having had his crops burnt by a fire lighted upon the defendants' land by their contractor which spread into the plaintiff's land. It was found by the court below, and this finding was adopted by the Privy Council, that the defendants had contracted with a contractor to clear certain bush off their lands, partly by cutting the bush and partly by burning it, and that, pursuant to such contract, the contractor lighted the fire which subsequently spread on to the land and caused the injuries complained of. The Privy Council upon these facts held the defendants liable upon the ground that the lighting of a fire on open bush land where it might readily spread to adjoining property was an operation necessarily attended with danger, and a proprietor who executed such an operation was bound to use all reasonable precautions to prevent fire extending to his neighbour's property, and if he authorised another to act for him, he was bound, not only to stipulate that such precautions should be taken, but also to see that these are observed, otherwise he was responsible for the consequence, and Hughes v. Percival (9) was cited in support of this proposition.

Applying the principle laid down in these cases, it appears to me that the district council in the present case owed the above-mentioned duty to the plaintiffs, and they have not performed it. Digging under gas-pipes in use must necessarily be attended with risk, unless all reasonable precautions are taken to guard against such risk. If a gas-pipe be left unsupported it is obvious that it may thus become fractured, when an escape of gas with its attendant consequences will necessarily result, and indeed it is obvious from cl. 14, 45, and 46 of the contract in this case that risk was apprehended, for specific clauses were inserted therein so as to obviate the danger. It was not attempted to be proved on behalf of the district council that they had taken any precautions whatever; the sole point taken at the trial on their behalf was that they had delegated the performance of the works to a contractor, and, therefore, were not liable. Upon that they asked the learned judge to enter judgment for them, which he did.

It was argued before us that, even if the learned judge should not have done so, and that even if the district council were liable, the damages sought to be recovered were too remote, and Sharp v. Powell (14) was referred to as showing that this was so. In that case it was not known to the defendant's servant (and I apprehend that the court concluded that it was not to be held that he ought to have known), who was washing a van in a street, that the water he was using would not as usual run down a grating, which was there for that purpose, and so escape, but, by reason of a severe frost which existed would not do so, so that the grating got blocked with ice, and the water overflowed, whereby the plaintiff's horse slipped up, and was injured. If in the present case it was not in the ordinary course of things, if a gas-pipe were broken and the gas allowed to escape underneath a battened-down surface, that it would percolate where it could and escape upwards upon the first opportunity, then the case cited might have some application. But, in my opinion, the explosion in the present case was the direct consequence of the act of negligence complained of, and occurred in the ordinary course of events attended thereon, which would be known to anyone of intelligence who could think about the matter.

For the reasons above mentioned the district council are, in my judgment, liable, and the learned judge should not have acceded to their application and entered judgment for them. This appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiffs against the defendant council, with costs here and below.

RIGBY, L.J.—In my judgment the defendants, the Idle District Council, are liable to the plaintiffs in this action. I mention, in order to dispose of it at once, the objection that the damages claimed are too remote. The cause of damage was an explosion of gas, which escaped from a main broken by the negligence of the defendant Thornton while excavating or filling up a hole for a sewer. The gas found its way into the house occupied by the plaintiffs and was there ignited. On the question of remoteness the case would have been the same if the gas company had negligently caused the escape. In my opinion, the explosion in the plaintiffs' house was the natural and probable result of the negligence. Gas will find its way by the line of least resistance, and in this case it was prevented by the ramming down of the earth from escaping into the open air. Where it would go could not have been predicted without examination of the surrounding soil, but that it might find its way to some place where, being mixed with atmospheric air, it would be in great risk of being exploded, so as to do damage to person or property, was not only possible, but in a high degree probable and quite natural. That place happened to be the plaintiffs' house, and damage resulted which, in my judgment, was not too remote.

Apart from the question of remoteness, the only defence set up on the appeal was, that the defendant Thornton was an independent contractor for whose negligence the district council were not liable. I will assume at first that he was an independent contractor. His interference with the street would have been illegal but for the fact that he was acting as the agent and delegate of the district council who, having power to do the work under s. 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and other statutory provisions, employed Thornton to do it for them, so that he entered by reason of their authority, and their authority only. If they had done the work by the hands of their servants, it cannot be doubted that it would have been their duty to use all reasonable skill and care to prevent damage to any persons arising from their operations. The plaintiffs were, as the event proved, within the range of those operations, and not too remotely connected with them, and the duty would have been owed to them among others.

Notwithstanding a great conflict of judicial opinion, many dicta and some decisions to the contrary, I consider it always to have been on the balance of authority, and to be now clearly recognised as the law, that no one can get rid of such a duty by imposing it upon an independent contractor. As authorities it is sufficient to refer to the passage from the opinion of LORD BLACKBURN in Dalton v. Angus (8) already quoted by LINDLEY, L.J., and the cases therein mentioned; and as approaching more nearly in its facts to the present case, and in principle not to be distinguished from it, Gray v. Pullen (4). The true distinction between the cases of master and servant, and employer and independent contractor, seems to be that, where the person actually doing the work does something for which he would himself be liable, the master is, while the employer is not, liable for what is conveniently called collateral negligence, meaning thereby other negligence than the imperfect or improper performance of the work which the contractor is employed to do. Here the contract in express terms imposed upon the contractor the duty of taking proper precautions against injury to any gas-pipe that he might fall in with in the course of the excavation, the very duty (among others) which the law would have thrown upon the district council if acting by the hands of their servants.

I am, however, for myself satisfied that under the contract in this case Thornton and his workpeople were, for the purposes of the rule of law imposing liability for the negligence of servants on a master, in the position of servants of the district council. Under cll. 7 and 8 of the contract, as I read them, Thornton, his foreman and workmen, are bound to defer to the instructions and opinion of the inspector and obey his orders in every particular. Under cl. 11 the inspector has power to stop the works, or any part thereof, absolutely at any stage, to enlarge, diminish, modify, alter, or vary the works, or any part thereof, without invalidating the contract. Clause 14 provides expressly that the contractor shall, as between himself and the district council, be responsible for any neglect or carelessness in terms apparently sufficient to cover any breach of duty which would be imposed by law on the district council, including particularly the protection of any gas-pipes laid bare or otherwise interfered with; but this would not affect the nature of the relation between the parties. Independently of the wide general provisions before referred to, it is made plain (cll. 45 and 46), with regard to gas and water pipes, that the inspector is to have full control over the means adopted for the protection of gas-pipes. In fact, I have not been able to discover any single particular in which the contractor can act with greater freedom or independence than a hired servant could do. It is this unlimited right of control, whether actually exercised or not, which, in my opinion, is the condition for inferring the responsibility of a master. The case is manifestly widely different from Reedie v. London and North Western Rail. Co. (1), where a power of superintendence only was reserved, coupled with a power to dismiss any workman, not for disobedience to orders, but for incompetence only—a power analogous to that of rejecting improper materials during the progress of works, and not depriving the contractor of his right of doing the work according to his own initiative so long as he did it in accordance with his contract. It is distinguishable also from Steel v. South-Eastern Rail. Co. (13), where the contract was not produced, but the foreman of the contractor, speaking of Mr. Phillips, the company's surveyor, said: "Mr. Phillips was the person who told me what to do. But I was the responsible person to determine in what manner that which Mr. Phillips directed me to do should be carried out." The damage in that case was caused by negligence in doing work that was not only not ordered, but positively forbidden to be done.

On these grounds I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiffs against the district council according to the verdict of the jury.

Motion for an interim injunction to restrain the defendants, the Tower Publishing Co., Ltd. and H. A. Moncrieff, the receiver of the company who had been appointed in an action by the debenture-holders of the company, from selling without the consent of the plaintiff any of the assets in the possession of the defendants or either of them under or by virtue of three several agreements in writing made between the plaintiff and the company with reference to the printing and publication of three novels respectively, and also from selling or assigning, or purporting to sell or assign, without the like consent the benefits, rights, or interests alleged by the defendants to be now vested in them or one of them in or under the same three agreements.

The plaintiff was the author of three novels, and had entered into three agreements respectively with the defendant company for the publication of the same. The novels were duly published, and there was a considerable profit thereon. No formal agreements were ever drawn up, but the terms of the contracts were contained in certain letters which passed between the parties. The plaintiff shared the net profits with the defendant company, and the latter took all the risks of the adventure save the actual out-of-pocket expenses which were borne equally by them. The agreements were in fact based on what was usually called in the publishing business the "half-profit" system. The defendant company undertook to advertise the novels and generally to use their best endeavours to sell the same. The novels had previously been published in serial parts in "Pearson's Weekly," and the copyright remained with the plaintiff and Mr. Pearson, subject to the defendant company's right to produce the books in volume form under the several agreements. The defendant company subsequently became insolvent, and the defendant Moncrieff was appointed receiver. The defendant receiver informed the plaintiff of his intention to sell the plaintiff's books, and to assign the benefits, rights, and interests under the several agreements. Negotiations were in progress with another publishing company for the acquisition of the business of the defendant company. The plaintiff brought this action and moved for the injunction.

Millar, Q.C., and T. B. Napier for the plaintiff.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Edward Ford for the defendant receiver.

The company did not appear.

STIRLING, J., stated the facts, referred to the company's obligation to publish the novels under the several agreements, and continued: The work of publication involves a discretion on the part of those who undertake it. If this agreement, instead of being made with a limited company, had been entered into with a single individual or a partnership consisting of individuals, the cases are quite clear that the contract is of a personal nature, and on that ground is not assignable.

There were three authorities referred to in the course of the argument. I will not go through them, but they seem to be perfectly clear that agreements of this kind are not assignable. I would mention, with reference to one point, that the copyright is to remain with the plaintiff and Mr. Pearson, subject to the right of the defendant company to produce the novels in volumes under the several agreements. That seems at first sight to give something in the nature of copyright in the right of production in the volume work; but it simply forms a licence to produce the work for the purposes of the agreement. Unfortunately the defendant company has become insolvent. It is now unable to perform the agreements, and a receiver has been appointed. It is suggested that there is a difference between a company contractor and an individual contractor, and that, although a contract of this nature entered into between an author and a publisher who is an individual and publishers who are a firm consisting of individuals may not be assignable, yet a contract entered into with a limited company is assignable. I certainly should hesitate long before I laid down any such law as that.

If the contract is assignable, then it is not merely assignable in the case of a winding-up or liquidation, but must be assignable at any moment, and I think that it would be startling to authors who have entered into agreements with publishers who have recently converted their business into limited liability companies to be told that, although the agreements they entered into were not to be assignable by the old firms who converted themselves into companies, yet they were assignable by the limited company. But in truth it seems to me that it would be pushing too far the doctrine as to the non-assignability of such agreements to say that it rests on the personal confidence placed in individuals. I cannot hold that the non-assignability of such agreements as this rests on the view that the contract is entered into with persons in whom the author has confidence. The author may have confidence in a limited company just as much as in a private individual. A limited company may have a reputation for producing books in a particular manner and in a mode to attract the attention of the public, and the author selecting such a company as publishers may very naturally do so in the reasonable expectation that the company—although its members and its officers may fluctuate—may nevertheless consider themselves under an obligation to maintain the reputation which they have acquired. In the present case, what attracted the plaintiff to the defendant company (as appears from the evidence) was partly the fact that they had published a novel in a style which he approved and partly that he was satisfied that the company had a very efficient manager. True, they might have discharged the management next day and new officers of the company might at any time be appointed; but I repeat that the plaintiff might well act on the presumption that the defendant company would maintain its reputation.

It seems to me that I should be doing wrong if I drew any distinction in law in respect of an agreement made between an author and a private individual or firm of publishers on the one hand and agreements made between an author and an incorporated company on the other hand. If the first kind are non-assignable as is well established, it seems to me that the second kind are also non-assignable. I, therefore, think that, as regards the second part of this motion, an injunction must go. It is true that the assignment might be ineffective; but, nevertheless, it might give rise to conflicts between the plaintiff and other persons who might become innocent assignees of the defendant under instruments purporting to be valid assignments, and besides it might also tend to increase the costs of this action.

HIS LORDSHIP considered the question of what ought to be done with the books which had been printed and the books and other assets which were in the possession and control of the defendant receiver under the agreements, and held that they ought to be sold for the benefit of all parties interested and other creditors. There would be an undertaking not to deal with the assets in question under the control of the defendant receiver except under the direction of the court in this action, and also with the exception, that, as regards the books, the defendant receiver might offer them for sale in the ordinary course of business.

WILLSON v. LOVE

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.), April 30, 1896]

Contract—Breach—Damages—Liquidated damages or penalty—Tenancy agreement—Agricultural holding—Covenant against selling hay and straw off premises subject to “the additional rent of £3 per ton by way of penalty for every ton sold”—Stipulations of varying importance—Presumption of penalty.

A farm was let on lease for a term of years at a fixed rent and “the additional rent of £3 per ton by way of penalty for every ton of hay or straw which should be sold off the premises during the last twelve months of the tenancy.” The lessee also covenanted that during the last twelve months of the term he would not sell or carry away any hay or straw produced on the demised premises, but would use it on the farm. There was a difference of about 5s. per ton between the manorial value of hay and that of straw.

Held: as there was a substantial difference between the damage resulting from a breach of the covenant by a sale of hay and that resulting from a sale of straw, the agreed sum of £3 per ton was a penalty and not liquidated damages.

Per A. L. SMITH, L.J.: When there is a contract for the payment of a fixed sum of money in order to secure performance of more than one matter, the damages for breach of which vary in the several cases, there is a presumption that the sum so agreed to be paid is a penalty, and not liquidated damages.

Application by the plaintiffs for judgment or a new trial after the trial of the action before HENN COLLINS, J., with a jury.

By an indenture of lease Rowley Farm, in the county of Durham, was demised for a term of twenty-one years, which expired in May, 1895, at the rent therein mentioned,

“and the additional rent of £3 per ton by way of penalty for every ton of hay or straw which shall be sold off the premises during the last twelve months of the tenancy, provided also that for every ton of hay or straw so sold off the premises before the lastly hereinbefore mentioned twelve months the lessees shall bring an equivalent in manure on the land.”

The lessees also covenanted that they would not during the last twelve months of the term sell, or dispose of, or carry away any hay, straw, grass or clover, turnips or fodder which should grow upon or be produced from the said demised premises or any part thereof, but would spend and consume the same upon the said premises. The present action was brought to recover damages at the rate of £3 per ton in respect of a breach of the covenant above set out by the sale of fifty tons of hay and straw off the demised premises during the last twelve months of the tenancy. The defendants paid money into court. At the trial of the action before HENN COLLINS, J., with a jury, evidence was given that there was a difference of about 5s. per ton between the manurial value of hay and that of straw. The learned judge ruled that the sum of £3 per ton payable under the lease was a penalty and not liquidated damages, and he therefore left to the jury the question of the amount of damages. The jury assessed the damages at a sum less than that which the defendants had paid into court, and the learned judge gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs moved for judgment or a new trial.

Channell, Q.C., and Meek for the defendants.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The question which we have to decide, upon this application for a new trial, is whether the sum of £3 per ton which under this lease is to be paid for every ton of hay or straw which shall be sold off the demised premises during the last twelve months of the tenancy is a penalty, or whether it is liquidated damages. That is a question of the true construction of the document, and is a question for the judge alone. HENN COLLINS, J., ruled that this sum was a penalty, and the court has now to say whether or not his ruling was right.

In construing the lease, we must take into consideration the facts which existed at the time when it was made. There was a difference of about 5s. per ton between the manurial values of hay and of straw for the purposes of this farm. It has been argued that that is so small a difference as to be of no consequence, but I cannot agree with that contention. The difference seems to me to be a most material one. In this lease the parties have agreed that one sum, viz., £3 per ton, shall be paid for a breach of this covenant whether that breach occur through the sale off the premises of hay or of straw. They have also agreed that this sum is to be paid as penal rent. An attempt was made to draw a fine distinction on this point, because the parties to the lease speak of this penalty as an "additional rent by way of penalty," and not as a penalty simply. I cannot myself see any difference between the two expressions, and I take it that the parties have agreed that this sum of £3 per ton is simply to be paid by way of penalty. But that matter is not decisive. It is not the first time that this point has been considered by the court, and a succession of judges have held that the use by the parties to a contract of the term "penalty" is not conclusive. Circumstances may show that upon the true construction of the document a sum agreed to be paid as a penalty, is to be treated as liquidated damages. Still, no case decides that the word chosen by the parties to the contract is to be disregarded altogether, and I think that, if they have chosen to use the word "penalty," it lies on those who maintain that the agreed sum is liquidated damages, and not a penalty, to show that their contention is correct.

I know of no absolute decision on this point, except the Irish case that has been cited of Wright v. Tracey (1), but there is a series of dicta by several learned judges. In Wallis v. Smith (2) SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., went through all these dicta, and found fault with all of them. He said that, if he could, he would have overruled all of them, but it was not possible for him to do so. Since his judgment the point has been before the House of Lords, and, though it has not been actually decided, they cannot be said to have intended to overrule all those dicta. In fact the House of Lords seems to me to have confirmed them. In the Scottish case of Lord Elphinstone v. Monkland Iron and Coal Co. (3), LORD WATSON used these words (11 App. Cas. at p. 342) :

"When a single lump sum is made payable by way of compensation, on the occurrence of one or more or all of several events, some of which may occasion serious and others but trifling damage, the presumption is that the parties intended the sum to be penal, and subject to modification."

If, instead of saying "trifling damage," he had said "much less damage," or "substantially less damage," then he would have laid down a proposition in accordance with all the dicta of earlier judges, and it is to be observed that this case was decided in 1886, that is to say, after the judgment of SIR GEORGE JESSEL in Wallis v. Smith (2). Then LORD HERSCHELL says (ibid. at p. 345) :

"The agreement does not provide for the payment of a lump sum upon the non-performance of any one of many obligations differing in importance."

He there means to lay down the same proposition as LORD WATSON. In the case now before us there is a substantial difference between the damage which would result from a breach of the covenant by a sale of hay and the damage resulting from a breach by a sale of straw, but the same sum is payable in either event. I am therefore of opinion that the money agreed to be paid is a penalty, and not liquidated damages.

An Irish case has been cited in the argument, namely, Wright v. Tracey (1); in which a sum of £200 was agreed to be payable for a breach of any one of several agreements for keeping in repair some gates and palings, and a churn, and that the tenant would not underlet or assign. If the dicta in the English cases are right, it seems to me to be obvious that that sum was a penalty, and not liquidated damages. It is unnecessary to say more about that case, because it does not in any way bind us in this court. I think this application must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I have not the least doubt that this sum of £3 per ton is a penalty, and not liquidated damages. From the decision in Kemble v. Farren (4) down to the present day the general opinion has been that when there is a contract for the payment of a fixed sum of money in order to secure performance of more than one matter, the damages for breach of which vary in the several cases, there is a presumption that the sum so agreed to be paid is a penalty, and not liquidated damages. In the present case an additional rent is payable by way of penalty at the rate of £3 per ton for every ton of hay or straw which shall be sold off the premises during the last twelve months of the tenancy. This sum has been agreed upon to secure the performance of two stipulations, one regarding hay, the other regarding straw, and the evidence shows that these stipulations vary in importance. Since they are in fact of varying importance, it seems to me to follow that the sum agreed to be paid in order to secure their performance is a penalty, and not liquidated damages.

In many cases that have come before the courts, the question has been whether an agreement between the parties that a certain sum should be considered as liquidated damages could be cut down in such a way that the sum should be considered to be in reality a penalty. In the case before us the £3 per ton has been agreed by the parties to be payable by way of penalty, not as liquidated damages. If the parties had meant to say that which the plaintiff contends that they meant to say, they would have described this sum as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty. It is not a conclusive argument that the agreed sum must be a penalty or liquidated damages, according as in each particular case the parties may have described it; but I think that where the parties have chosen to call the sum a penalty, strong evidence must be given to show that it is nevertheless liquidated damages, and there is not such evidence in the present case. I think that HENN COLLINS, J., was right, and that this application should be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—Upon the main question, that this application should be dismissed, I agree. But I do not think that the cases are yet very clear upon the point that has here been raised. The judgment in Kemble v. Farren (4) has been construed in different ways by two such eminent authorities as SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., and JAMES, L.J. The difference between them has arisen as to the real meaning of a sentence in the judgment in that case. The result of looking at the cases seems to me to be this, that the courts went wrong when they departed from the simple rule that the parties to a contract meant that which they have expressed in their agreement, and consequently it is now difficult to get at any clear rule on the subject. I cannot say that I feel I have any such grasp of the principle of the authorities as to say that HENN COLLINS, J., was wrong, or to entitle me to differ from the judgments that have been delivered. Wallis v. Smith (2) does not seem to me to be of much use in the present case. The question in that case was as to the forfeiture of a deposit, and the principles governing that case are not the same as those applicable to the question now before the court.

A retrospective operation is not to be given to a statute so as to impair an existing right or obligation otherwise than as regards matters of procedure, unless that effect cannot be avoided without doing violence to the language of the enactment. If the enactment is expressed in language which is capable of being construed prospectively or retrospectively it ought to be construed as being prospective only.

Section 23 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890 [see now s. 66 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914], provided: "Where a debt has been proved upon a debtor's estate under the principal Act [Bankruptcy Act, 1883] and such debt includes interest, or any pecuniary consideration in lieu of interest, such interest or consideration shall, for the purposes of dividend, be calculated at a rate not exceeding five per centum per annum. . . ." This section held not to be retrospective and not applicable to a debt including interest in excess of the five per cent. proved under a scheme allowed by the court prior to the passing of the Act.

Notes. Section 23 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, has been repealed. See now s. 66 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (2 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 398).

Motion by the assignee of a creditor of the debtor, for a declaration that he was entitled to payment of all dividends already declared, or thereafter to be declared, on the full amount of his assignor's proof for £10,153 1s. 8d., a part of which was for interest at a higher rate than £5 per cent. per annum.

The receiving order was made on Jan. 31, 1890, and on April 15, 1890, a scheme was accepted, and, in pursuance of the scheme, a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors was executed by the debtor on June 23, 1890. The scheme received the approval of the court on June 25, 1890. The scheme of arrangement, the terms of which were embodied in the deed of assignment for the benefit of the creditors, provided (inter alia) as follows :

"(1.) That the property of the debtor divisible amongst his creditors shall vest in the trustee hereafter appointed for administration as in bankruptcy subject to the provisions of this scheme, and that before approval of this scheme by the court the debtor shall execute in favour of the trustee a deed embodying the terms of this scheme.

(4.) That all debts directed to be paid in priority to other debts in the distribution of the property of a bankrupt shall be so paid by the trustee under this scheme out of the property of the debtor.

(5.) That the trustee shall distribute the net proceeds of the debtor's property among the creditors in accordance with the law of bankruptcy."

The deed of assignment provided for the conversion of the debtor's property, the net proceeds of the sale to be held by the trustee, after the payment of his costs and expenses :

"To pay all claims which are by law entitled to be paid in full or priority to other debts in case of bankruptcy, and to pay, divide, and distribute the residue of the said moneys rateably unto and among the creditors of the said debtor who are entitled to prove against his estate under the said receiving order, and upon the amounts for which they are entitled to prove by such instalments and at such times as the committee of inspection shall direct."

No dividend was payable until 1897, when the trustee having been advised that s. 23 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, which received the Royal Assent on Aug. 18, 1890, and came into operation on Jan. 1, 1891, was retrospective in its operation, applied to the applicant for particulars of his proof for £10,153 1s. 8d., a large part of which was admittedly made up of interest at a rate exceeding 5 per cent. per annum. On the trustee's refusal to pay a dividend on the whole amount of the proof, this motion was made.

The Bankruptcy Act, 1890, s. 23, provided :

“Where a debt has been proved upon a debtor’s estate under the principal Act [Bankruptcy Act, 1883], and such debt includes interest, or any pecuniary consideration in lieu of interest, such interest or consideration shall, for the purposes of dividend, be calculated at a rate not exceeding five per centum per annum, without prejudice to the right of a creditor to receive out of the estate any higher rate of interest to which he may be entitled after all the debts proved in the estate have been paid in full.”

Aug. 12, 1898. WRIGHT, J., read the following judgment.—In the early part of 1890 the debtor failed, and his estate was on June 23 of that year assigned for the benefit of his creditors under a scheme accepted by his creditors on the previous April 15, and on June 25 approved by the court, which provided for “administration as in bankruptcy subject to the provisions of this scheme,” and directed that, subject to payment of debts,

“directed to be paid in priority to other debts in the administration of the property of a bankrupt,” and subject to certain other expenses, the trustee should “distribute the net proceeds of the debtor’s property among the creditors in accordance with the law of bankruptcy.”

The assignment which was executed in pursuance of the scheme declared a similar trust, first for expenses, next

“to pay all claims which are by law entitled to be paid in full in priority to other debts in cases of bankruptcy, and to pay, divide, and distribute the residue of the said moneys rateably unto and among the creditors of the said debtor who are entitled to prove against his estate under the said receiving order, and upon the amounts for which they are entitled to so prove.”

A creditor in the present case proved for a debt which carried interest at a rate exceeding 5 per cent. Afterwards, on Aug. 18 of the same year, the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, was passed, with a section postponing its operation until Jan. 1, 1891. Section 23 of that Act enacts as follows: [His LORDSHIP read the section.] And the question is whether this enactment operates so as to govern the distribution of dividend under a contract made under a scheme which had taken effect before the Act was passed or came into operation.

For the applicant it is argued that the section operates only on bankruptcies occurring or schemes taking effect after the commencement of the Act; and, further, that in any case the scheme ought to be construed as a contract for distribution of the estate according to the Act which was in force at the time when the scheme was adopted and took effect. The latter of these contentions ought not in my opinion to prevail if it stood alone. In the absence of any express provision in the scheme for this particular matter, I think that the scheme must be construed as applying the bankruptcy law for the time being in force or to be in force, in so far as such law may not be inconsistent with the express provisions of the scheme, or excluded by any rule of law or rule of construction; and if this view is correct, the only question is whether there is a rule of law or construction which prevents this section being interpreted as operating retrospectively. Perhaps no rule of construction is more deeply established than this—that a retrospective operation is not to be given to a statute so as to impair an existing right or obligation otherwise than as regards matters of procedure, unless that effect cannot be avoided without doing violence to the language of the enactment. If the enactment is expressed in language which is capable of either interpretation, it ought to be construed as prospective only.

Some of the many authorities for this proposition are Main v. Stark (1), Gilmore v. Shuter (2), on the Statute of Frauds; Moon v. Durden (3), on the Gaming Acts; Hickson v. Darlow (4), on the Bills of Sale Acts; Waugh v. Middleton (5), an extreme case, but not disapproved of in Larpent v. Bibby (6), Williams v. Harding (7), Hough v. Windus (8), Ellis v. McCormick (9), on the Bankruptcy Acts; and in Re Joseph Suche Co., Ltd. (10), on s. 10 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875. In the last-mentioned case SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said (1 Ch.D. at p. 49): "Since this question came last before me I have consulted several of the other judges;" and, referring to s. 10 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875, he said (ibid. at p. 50):

"I prefer on this occasion to rest my decision on the more general grounds that the section was not intended to apply to any case of a winding-up which had been commenced before the Act came into operation. I so decide because it is a general rule that when the legislature alters the rights of parties by taking away or conferring any right of action, its enactments, unless in express terms they apply to pending actions, do not affect them. It is said that there is one exception to that rule, namely, that where enactments merely affect procedure and do not extend to rights of action, they have been held to apply to existing rights, and it is suggested here that the alteration made by this section is within that exception. I am of opinion that it is not. This is an alteration not merely in procedure, but in the right to prove for a debt which is not distinguishable in substance from a right of action before winding-up, being simply a legal proceeding to recover a debt against a company in liquidation."

One exception to the general rule has sometimes been suggested, namely, that where, as here, the commencement of the operation of an Act is suspended for a time, this is an indication that no further restriction upon retrospective operation is intended. But this exception seems never to have been suggested except in relation to statutes affecting procedure, such as Statutes of Limitation, and even in relation to them it is questioned in Moon v. Durden (3). Moreover, ss. 6 and 8 of this Act have been held not to be retrospective, notwithstanding, though without reference to this suspensory clause: (Re Raison, Ex parte Raison (11), and R. v. Griffiths (12)). In the present case the enactment does not merely affect procedure. If the section is construed retrospectively, it will postpone the creditor's right to dividend beyond 5 per cent., and will pro tanto deprive him of the vested right of action which he possessed at the commencement of the Act, and when the bankruptcy occurred.

Then is the section so expressed as to be plainly retrospective? No doubt the words "where a debt has been proved under the principal Act" are capable of such a meaning. But this form of words is often used to refer, not to a past which preceded the enactment, but to a time which is made past by anticipation, a time which will have become a past time only when the event occurs on which the statute is to operate. In former times draftsmen would have used the words "where a debt shall have been proved," but in modern Acts the past tense is frequently used where no retrospective operation can be intended. In Moon v. Durden (3) even the phrase last mentioned was held not retrospective. It seems to me that the case for the trustee cannot be put higher than this—that either construction is possible; but if so, the authorities to which I have referred show that retrospective force ought not to be given to the section.

It is not necessary in the present case to decide whether the section would apply where the original contract was made before the passing or commencement of the Act, but a scheme is adopted and approved after the commencement of the Act. In such a case the question would probably depend on the provisions of the scheme as approved, and if a creditor in such a case assented without qualification to a scheme which according to its ordinary construction attracts the existing bankruptcy law, he might probably be held to have waived any right which he might otherwise have to stand upon his original contract.

It should be observed that by s. 31 of the Act of 1890 that Act and the Act of 1883 are to be construed as one Act. This enactment, however, cannot have the effect of making the provisions of the Act of 1890 operative as from 1883; nor could it be so held consistently with Re Raison (11) and R. v. Griffiths (12).

Executor—Retainer—Insolvent estate—Administration order in bankruptcy—Debt due to executor—Assets paid to official receiver without retaining debt—Mistake—Right of executor to repayment by official receiver of amount of debt—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict., c. 52), ss. 44, 125.

The executrix of an insolvent estate, which was being administered in bankruptcy, paid over to the official receiver the whole assets collected by her prior to the administration order, without, she being ignorant of her right of retainer, retaining the amount of a debt due to her from the testator. Subsequently the executrix proved for her debt in the bankruptcy, but, on ascertaining her right of retainer, she withdrew her proof before it had been adjudicated upon, and claimed for the amount of her debt.

Held: (i) the executrix had a right to retain her debt out of the assets in her hands as against the official receiver and only the balance of the assets vested in him under s. 125 (5) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883; (ii) the executrix, not knowing her rights, having paid over the whole assets to the official receiver, who had not distributed them, no injustice would be done if he was ordered to repay the executrix the amount which she was entitled to retain; (iii) proof by the executrix in the bankruptcy, which was withdrawn on discovering her error, did not deprive her of her right to the return of the sum due to her; accordingly, the executrix was entitled to be repaid the amount of her debt out of the assets in the hands of the official receiver.

Appeal by the official receiver, as trustee for administration of the testator's estate in bankruptcy, from a decision of WRIGHT, J., reported [1899] 1 Q.B. 905. H

By his will, G. W. Rhoades, who died on April 14, 1898, appointed his wife his executrix, who proved the will on June 29, 1898, and proceeded to get in and realise the assets, and paid the moneys collected into a bank to an account opened in her own name. The executrix was a creditor of the estate for money lent by her to the testator amounting to £604 3s. 4d. On July 11, 1898, the executrix had notice of a petition, under s. 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, for an order for the administration in bankruptcy of the testator's estate, and at that date there was £895 3s. 3d. standing to her credit at the bank, representing such part of the testator's estate as had been realised by her. On July 25, 1898, the usual administration order was made, and the official receiver became the trustee. On July 30, 1898, the official receiver called upon the executrix to pay over to him the money standing to her credit at the bank, which then amounted to about £1,100 which she at once did, in the belief that she was bound in law to pay, and in ignorance of her right of retainer. On Aug. 9, 1898, the executrix lodged a proof for her debt, when she ascertained for I the first time her right of retainer; and on Aug. 15, 1898, she withdrew her proof, before it had been adjudicated upon, and set up her right of retainer. The official receiver declined to recognise her claim of retainer; and thereupon she applied for a declaration that as executrix she was entitled to exercise her right of retainer in respect of the sum of £604 3s. 4d., and for an order that the official receiver might be directed to pay her that amount out of the moneys in his hands.

WRIGHT, J., decided that the executrix was entitled to be repaid the amount of the debt owing to her in full out of the assets in the hands of the official receiver, the mere fact of payment into his hands of assets collected by her prior to the making of the administration order not being a bar to her right of retainer any more than payment into court would have been. His Lordship also decided that the fact that the executrix, in ignorance of her right of retainer, had lodged a proof for the amount of the debt, which was withdrawn before it had been adjudicated upon, made no difference. From that decision the official receiver appealed.

June 9, 1899. SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R., read the following judgment of the court, in which after stating the facts, he continued: Two questions arise. The first and most important is whether the executrix had a right to retain her debt as against the trustee in bankruptcy. The second is whether, if she had, she lost this right by paying the whole £1,100 over to the trustee and by afterwards proving for her debt. It is not denied that she had a right to retain and might have exercised it before the order was made, or, to be more accurate, before she knew that an application for such an order had been made.

Ex parte Gilbert (1) settled this. But it is contended that, as she had not exercised her right before that date, she could not do so afterwards. The older common law authorities go far to show that if an executor was a creditor of his deceased testator and had assets in his hands sufficient to pay his debt (and all others of a higher degree, if any) such debt was treated as extinguished. Sufficient assets to pay his own debt and properly applicable thereto being in the executor's hands, such assets were treated without more as applied by him to such payment. BLACKSTONE says so distinctly (BLACKSTONES COMMENTARIES (18th Edn.), vol. 3, at p. 18). His words are: ". . . so much as is sufficient to answer his own demands is by operation of law applied to that particular purpose." PLOWDEN goes further, and says that the property in the assets is changed: see Woodward v. Lord Darcy (2), 1 Plowd. at p. 186. But this can only be true if the assets spoken of can be identified and appropriated to the debt which they have satisfied, and this presupposes the exercise of the right in fact; and in the case in PLOWDEN it had been so exercised. Until the executor does some act to show which assets he retains, it is obvious that the property in them cannot be changed. But it was settled that an executor sued by a creditor could give a retainer by himself in satisfaction of his own debt in evidence under a general plea of plene administravit, and that he need not plead a retainer specially: (1 Wm. Saunders, 333, n. 6). The extent to which the doctrine that his debt was extinguished was carried is further illustrated by the cases collected in WILLIAMS ON EXECUTORS (9th Edn.), vol. 2, at p. 1180 [see new 14th Edn., vol. 1, at p. 479] and which show that an executor, having assets sufficient and properly applicable to pay a debt due to him from his testator, could not sue the testator's heir nor any third person who might be liable with the testator for the debt in question.

It is quite plain from these authorities that the executor's right to retain assets in his hands was as against him treated as enforced as soon as he could properly enforce it. It would be very strange if it were held that he had lost his right because he had done nothing to assert it before there was any occasion to do so. It is only when someone seeks to take assets out of the executor's possession that it becomes necessary for him to assert his right of retainer; and, if he asserts it then, his right must be protected, unless, of course, he has released it or done something to deprive himself of it. In the present case, when the order for the administration of the testator's estate was made, his executrix had assets in her hands to the value of £1,100. This sum was standing to her credit at her bankers. We attach no importance to the fact that the account was not in form opened in her name as executrix. The £1,100 represented the assets of the testator, and, if the executrix had become bankrupt, the whole of this sum would not have passed and been distributable as her property amongst her creditors. She was, however, a creditor of the deceased for £600. This is admitted. She had a right to retain this sum out of the £1,100 as against the other creditors of the deceased. This is quite clear. If it were to the interest of other people to say she was paid, as it might be if she was claiming interest on the £600 after she had assets sufficient to pay it, the authorities show that she could be treated as having paid herself; but then only the balance of the £1,100 could be treated as the testator's assets. On what principle can the trustee in bankruptcy claim more than the balance? We can discover none.

The question is, what property vests in him by virtue of s. 125 (5) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883? His only claim is as trustee for the testator's creditors. The property vested in him by s. 125 (5), has to be distributed among them. What they have no right to he has no right to: see s. 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Section 125 does not enlarge the property to be distributed or deprive third parties of any rights which they have acquired to withdraw from distribution assets in their possession, and which they have a right to retain. Hasluck v. Clark (3) shows this. It is true that an executor with a right of retainer has not all the rights of a secured creditor: see Re Neville, Lee v. Nuttall (4). He has no right to retain against creditors of a higher degree than himself, but his right to retain is a right to withdraw from the assets in his hands distributable among himself and other creditors of equal degree enough to pay himself in full. His right to retain does not extend to assets which he has not got in and which are not in his possession, nor to equitable assets; but no question as to them arises here. His right extends both in law and in equity to all legal assets which he has in his hands, and there is nothing in s. 125 to deprive him of this right. The judgment of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., in Re Williams (5) supports this conclusion. Counsel for the official receiver relied on authorities collected in WILLIAMS ON EXECUTORS (9th Edn.), vol. 1, at p. 885 [see new 14th Edn., vol. 1, at p. 474] and which show that if an executor dies without having exercised his right, his executor cannot exercise it unless he also represents the testator. But whatever difficulty there may be in reconciling these cases with BLACKSTONE'S statement above referred to, they are quite consistent with the right of the executrix to retain her debt as against the trustee claiming her testator's assets. A similar observation applies to the judgment of WIGRAM, V.-C., in Burge v. Brutton (6). The only person who has a right of retainer is the legal personal representative of the testator, and if such representative is dead, his representative cannot himself first exercise the right unless he also represents the testator: Re Compton (7). This doctrine has no application to this case. There is no analogy between death and an order for administering assets in bankruptcy under s. 125 of the Bankruptcy Act. For these reasons we have come to the conclusion that the executrix in this case had a right to retain her debt out of the assets in her hands as against the appellant, and that only the balance of those assets vested in him under s. 125 (5).

The second question presents no real difficulty. The executrix, not knowing her rights, paid the whole £1,100 over to the trustee. He, however, has not distributed the assets, and no injustice will be done to him or to anyone if he is ordered to repay to her the amount which she was entitled to retain. Ex parte James (8) and Ex parte Simmonds (9) are distinct authorities to show that mistakes of this kind, although attributable to ignorance of law, can and will be set right by the court so long as the officer of the court still has the money in his hands. Still less can the proof by the executrix in the bankruptcy, withdrawn, as it was, when she discovered her error, deprive her of her right to have her money back. The judgment appealed from is right on all points, and the appeal, therefore, must be dismissed with costs.

Application by the plaintiff for judgment or for a new trial on appeal from the C verdict and judgment at the trial before LORD RUSSELL, C.J., with a jury in Middlesex.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries which he had sustained. The defendant was the landlord of a house, which had been recently built, and was let to a weekly tenant. The landlord had not agreed to do any repairs.
The plaintiff was employed by the tenant to remove some furniture from the house, D and while he was removing the furniture he was injured by reason of a staircase within the house giving way beneath him. At the trial evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiff that the staircase was defective and unsafe in its construction, and that it was so at the time when the house was let by the defendant. The action was tried before LORD RUSSELL, C.J., and a jury, and the learned judge held that there was no case to go to the jury, and directed a verdict for the defendant. The E plaintiff appealed.

Dec. 19, 1896.—LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff sued the F defendant, the owner of a house, to recover damages for injuries sustained by him owing to the defective condition of the staircase of the house. At the trial the Lord Chief Justice held that the plaintiff had not made out any case, and directed a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff has appealed, and asks for a new trial.

The evidence showed that the defendant was the owner of the house, but that it G was let to a tenant who was in possession at the time when the accident happened to the plaintiff. There was also evidence that at the time when the house was let to the tenant, the staircase was in an unsafe condition, and that the defect then existed owing to which the plaintiff was afterwards injured. The plaintiff had gone into the house at the request of the tenant in order to remove the tenant's furniture, and while so doing was injured owing to the defective condition of the staircase. H
The question we have now to decide is whether the defendant can be made liable under such circumstances for the injuries caused to the plaintiff. There was not any contractual relation between the plaintiff and the defendant. This case is not like that of a person who keeps a shop and intends and invites people to enter. It has been argued, however, that there was negligence on the part of the defendant which caused the injury to the plaintiff, because he had let the house in an unsafe I condition. It has been held that one person cannot be made liable to another for negligence unless there is some relation between them which gives rise to a duty towards the person injured, which has been neglected. Such a relation arises under many circumstances, as was pointed out in Heaven v. Pender (2) and Le Lievre v.
Gould (3).

Was there, in this case, any duty owing by the defendant towards the plaintiff?
It has been pointed out in the previous cases that persons who are upon a highway have the duty imposed upon them to take reasonable care not to interfere with each other. So also, if a man has a house adjoining a highway, a duty towards the persons using the highway is imposed upon him; and also a man owes a duty towards his next-door neighbour. In such cases he is liable, if by negligently managing his house or allowing it to be unsafe, he causes injury to persons using the highway or to his neighbour. In the present case the negligence alleged is that the defendant let his house to a tenant in an unsafe condition. It has been held that no duty is imposed upon a landlord, as between him and his tenant, not to let his house in a dilapidated condition, apart from a special contract. If, in such case there is no duty towards the tenant, there cannot be any duty towards a stranger. There was, therefore, in this case no duty owing by the defendant to the plaintiff, and consequently there could be no liability for negligence. The ruling of the Lord Chief Justice was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff in this case complains of a defect in the staircase of a house belonging to the defendant, and let by him to a tenant. It is contended that the landlord is liable for injuries sustained by the plaintiff, a workman employed by the tenant. The rule is that neither the landlord nor the tenant is liable to put into repair, or to repair, the demised premises unless such a liability is created by a contract between them. There is no implied contract between them in this respect. A landlord who lets his house in a dangerous or unsafe condition is not liable to the tenant, or to his tenant's customers or guests, for accidents happening during the term, unless he has contracted to keep the premises in repair. In this case, then, there was no liability arising out of any contract. It is argued, however, that the claim may be based upon the negligence of the defendant. There is no liability for negligence unless there is a breach of some duty. No duty in a case like this exists even towards the tenant, and therefore none can exist towards strangers. A case like this is entirely different from the case in which, by reason of the dangerous condition of premises, injury is caused to persons on the highway, or to the occupier of adjoining property. I think that the Lord Chief Justice was right in holding that the plaintiff had no case, and this appeal must be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I entirely agree. I desire only to add that the liability of a landlord for letting premises in a dangerous condition is not limited to cases of public nuisances, but extends to cases where the injury is caused upon adjoining property. As to the question in the present case, I accept the proposition of ERLE, C.J., in Robbins v. Jones (1), where he said (15 C.B.N.S. at p. 240) :

“A landlord who lets a house in a dangerous state, is not liable to the tenant's customers or guests for accidents happening during the term; for, fraud apart, there is no law against letting a tumble-down house, and the tenant's remedy is upon his contract, if any.”

I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

The main object of a company, incorporated in May, 1897, was to take over the undertakings and assets of three other companies formed with reference to the Diamond Jubilee which was celebrated in that year. Further objects of the company, stated in later clauses of the memorandum, were to carry on all kinds of promotion business, to act as agents, surveyors and builders, and to acquire, sell and deal in rooms, etc., for viewing processions, spectacles, entertainments and other public gatherings and to supply refreshments to persons attending these. The Jubilee being over, there was an admitted loss of some 70 per cent. of the subscribed capital of the company, but the directors did not intend to wind-up the company and contemplated entering into fresh business. They had not told the shareholders of these plans. One of the shareholders presented a petition to wind-up the company on the ground that it was "just and equitable" to do so within the meaning of s. 79 (5) of the Companies Act, 1862 [now s. 222 (f) of the Companies Act, 1948].

Held: the Jubilee being over, the substratum of the company had gone, and since the later object clauses must be treated merely as giving powers incidental to the main object of the company and not as defining different objects from the main object, the fresh business contemplated by the directors was ultra vires; in these circumstances it was "just and equitable" for the court to make a winding-up order even though the directors had not yet submitted their plans regarding the fresh business to the shareholders.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and W. E. Vernon for the company.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I think I ought to make the winding-up order. The petition, I agree, can only be supported under sub-s. (5)—the “just and equitable” clause—of s. 79 of the Companies Act, 1862; but, in my judgment, it can be supported under that clause.

This company was formed, as shown by its memorandum, to acquire and take over the undertakings and assets of three companies formed with reference to the Diamond Jubilee. [His Lordship read sub-cll. (a), (b), and (c) of cl. 3 and continued:] The Jubilee is over, and any loss or profit which was to be incurred or gained by carrying out that which on the face of the memorandum was the principal and primary object of the company has come to an end. There has been admittedly a loss; it is said to be about 70 per cent. of the subscribed capital, although the amount is perhaps immaterial. All that is now to be done is to return the percentage which remains for them out of the balance or wreckage to the shareholders after deducting the losses and expenses. It is of course under the circumstances within the functions of the company acting by its directors and officers to perform this duty and to adjust these matters among the shareholders. But it is suggested by the petition that it is right, having regard to the fact that the business which the company was formed to carry on has come to an end, that the company should be wound-up by the court in order that what is left may be duly distributed.

If nothing was left to be done but make such division and adjustment, and there were no other circumstances in the case, I do not think the court ought to or could make the winding-up order. But it is said that it is “just and equitable” to wind-up the company in this particular case, because the principal business which the company was formed to carry on has come to an end, and that the directors, so far from setting about to divide and adjust the balance of assets, are contemplating entering on fresh business which is ultra vires. The company cannot enter on any business of the nature of its principal and primary business, because that is connected with the Jubilee, which is a thing of the past, and in that state of things it is said the company ought at once to be wound-up, and that, as the directors, as far as one can judge, have no intention to wind-up this company, of which the substratum is gone in the sense I have mentioned, it is just and equitable that the company should be wound-up by the court. A

It is also said that the business which the directors have in contemplation would be ultra vires the company, notwithstanding the general terms of the later object clauses of the memorandum, the terms of which are so wide that it is impossible to suggest any business which would not be included therein, if they are not read as including only matters incidental to the main or primary business. My answer is, that I think that I ought not to read the later object clauses as defining a succession of objects different from the main objects, but that I ought to consider them as general powers providing for the execution by the company of matters which are merely incidental to its main objects. It is incredible that those who subscribed for shares and read this memorandum of association thought that the Jubilee object was only one among many objects of the company. Practically one cannot doubt that anyone who took shares in the company took them under the impression that the business was to begin and finish with the Diamond Jubilee. B C

Arriving, as I do, at the conclusion that the business of the company has come to an end, I have further to consider whether I ought in this state of things to say that it is just and equitable to wind up the company without waiting till the views of the directors are submitted to a meeting of the shareholders. I think I ought not to wait, because I think the views of the directors, ex facie show that business which is ultra vires is intended. And there are other matters which affect my discretion, e.g., the question as to the fitness of this board to carry out the division and adjustment which I have referred to. If that were the only question, I do not say that it would not be one to be decided by the domestic forum of the shareholders, but when the substratum is gone in the sense I have mentioned, I must bear in mind that the directors are not applying themselves to distribute the salvage, but are contemplating business which is not within the scope of the memorandum. D E

Assuming that I ought to take into consideration the conduct of the directors with reference to the proposed carrying on of an ultra vires business, the prima facie right to have the question settled by the domestic forum is gone, and the matter is left to the discretion of the court. Under pressure of this petition the directors have issued a circular which leaves the shareholders practically in the dark as to what is to be done with their money. I am also struck with the fact that the directors have not communicated their plans to the shareholders. But it is enough to show that, whatever their plans may be, they have not waited to consult the shareholders before acting upon their own views. Without placing particular reliance upon this, I cannot help being struck by the fact that, the company having been formed to carry on these Jubilee businesses, no information has been given me as to what amount of cash was made over by the shareholders of those syndicates to those syndicates, or what amount was handed over by them to the amalgamated company. F G

It is said that there is already a sufficient expression of the wishes of the shareholders to show that a large majority is in favour of continuing the company. But whereas about £60,000 share capital has apparently been paid up, the shareholders supporting and opposing the petition together only represent a little over £3,000 of capital. The number of those opposing is greater than the number of those supporting, but those who oppose do not appear to have exercised any independent judgment. Under the circumstances, there is no such view or expression of wish as precludes me from making a winding-up order. The wishes of shareholders and creditors in winding-up and of the latter in bankruptcy are to be regarded, but in each case there is a difficulty in getting people to apply their reasoning faculties to matters put before them, and in this case I am not satisfied with the reasons put forward. H I

Counsel for the company called my attention to the decision in Re Irrigation Co. of France, Ex parte Fox (1), and said that the case supported the proposition which no one would dispute, that where a company is proceeding to do something which is ultra vires, a shareholder has a right of action to restrain the company by injunction from so acting, but that he has no right to come to the court and ask for a winding-up order under the "just and equitable" clause. I agree that this is generally a true proposition, and that there is a class of matters of an internal character which should be left to the decision of the shareholders; but I do not think that decision goes the length of saying that where the court has to consider whether it should take upon itself the adjustment of the rights of the shareholders of a company, the substratum of which is gone, the court should not take into consideration the fact that the directors intend entering upon businesses which in the opinion of the court were outside the memorandum of association. MR. BUCKLEY in his work on the COMPANIES ACTS (7th Edn.) at p. 245, says:

"So where a company is proceeding to do something which is ultra vires, a shareholder has a right in an action, on behalf of himself and all other shareholders, to restrain the company, though every shareholder but himself be acquiescent, but has no right to come for a winding-up order under the 'just and equitable' clause."

He cites Re Irrigation Co. of France, Ex parte Fox (1) as an authority for that proposition; but it is plain that that is a mere illustration of a passage a little earlier, where he says, stating the main proposition (ibid.):

"There is no doubt that the 'just and equitable' clause gives the court power to wind-up a company in cases not coming under any of the first four heads [of s. 79], but there must be strong ground for exercising the power, at any rate, at the instance of a shareholder."

The case is, therefore, within sub-s. (5) of s. 79 of the Act of 1862, and, without going into details, I may repeat what I said during the argument that the stringency in the application of this ejusdem generis rule has of late been considerably relaxed. There will be the usual compulsory winding-up order.

In an action for a libel, which was set out in the statement of claim, against the proprietors of a newspaper, the defendants admitted publication of the libel, but pleaded that they had published an apology, that the libel was published without their negligence or malice and that they had paid a sum into court as sufficient amends. Issue was joined on that defence. The plaintiff having obtained an order for discovery of documents, the defendants in their affidavit of documents admitted that they had in their possession the documents relating to the matter in issue, but objected to produce one of them, namely, the manuscript containing the words complained of, on the ground that it was the original contribution, and was that which was published by them for which they had admitted responsibility. The plaintiff obtained an order at chambers that the manuscript should be produced for his inspection. On appeal by the defendants,

Held: under the settled rule of practice referred to in Hennessey v. Wright (No. 2) (1) (1888), 24 Q.B.D. at p. 449, a plaintiff in a libel action, in the absence of special circumstances, was not entitled to information as to the writer of the libel, and, accordingly, the judge at chambers had wrongly exercised his discretion in favour of the plaintiff who was not entitled to inspect the manuscript.

Appeal by the defendants from an order of BRUCE, J., at chambers, affirming the order of a master for production of a document.

The plaintiff brought an action to recover damages for libel published in a newspaper of which the defendants were the proprietors. By their defence the defendants admitted publication, and pleaded that the libel was inserted in the newspaper without actual malice and without gross negligence, that before the action was commenced they had published a full apology, and that they paid into court a sum of money as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim. The plaintiff obtained an order for discovery of documents. The defendants, in their affidavit of documents, admitted they had in their possession or power the documents relating to the matter in question in the suit, set forth in the first and second parts of the schedule thereto. In the second part of the schedule there was the following paragraph:

"A manuscript of the story published in the [newspaper]. We object to produce it on the ground that the manuscript referred to is the original contribution to us, and is that which was published by us, as admitted in the first paragraph of the statement of defence, and as to which we admit responsibility."

The plaintiff applied at chambers for an order that the defendants should produce the manuscript for his inspection, and an order was made by the master. The defendants appealed, and the order was affirmed by BRUCE, J., at chambers, leave to appeal being given. The defendants appealed.

J. Eldon Bankes and Norman Craig for the defendants.

Montague Lush for the plaintiff.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that this is a matter of discretion, and that we can exercise a discretion in the matter. This was an action for libel brought against the proprietors of a newspaper. The defendants have admitted that they published the whole of the matter complained of and that it is defamatory. They have pleaded that which amounts to an answer to the claim, and if that plea is proved there must be judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff has asked for an order that he may inspect the document which has been included in the defendants' affidavit of documents. That document is not the libel complained of, but is the manuscript written by a contributor to the newspaper in order that the newspaper might publish it. As to the defendants' plea, it is without doubt a plea the proof of which lies entirely upon the defendants, who must prove the whole of it. If they fail to prove any part of it, they will fail in the action.

Then comes the question whether the plaintiff ought to be permitted to see the manuscript. I take it that, in Hennessy v. Wright (No. 2) (1), the court had to consider this very question, whether when a libel has been published by the defendant, for which he admits that he is responsible, he should be forced to say who gave him the materials for the published libel. In that case it was stated what was the practice of the common law judges on that point, and it was laid down that the defendant ought not to be made to disclose the name of his informant. LINDLEY, L.J., said (24 Q.B.D. at p. 449) :

“The judges of the Queen's Bench Division have arrived, as I understand, at a tolerably settled practice never to order production of such documents as this for reasons which I appreciate, although perhaps I should not have given effect to them in the first instance.”

The Court of Appeal, therefore, in that case recognised the rule that this information ought not to be given to a plaintiff suing in respect of a libel. The rule is, not that the court never will order that information to be given, but that as a general rule the court, as a matter of discretion, will not do so. This is the very point taken by the defendants in their affidavit of documents when they say that they “object to produce it on the ground that the manuscript referred to is the original contribution to us, and is that which was published by us, as admitted in the first paragraph of the statement of defence, and as to which we admit responsibility.” That objection seems to be founded upon Hennessy v. Wright (No. 2) (1). I think, therefore, that the learned judge at chambers ought, in the exercise of his discretion, to have followed the general rule laid down by the Court of Appeal in Hennessy v. Wright (No. 2) (1), and to have refused to order production of this document. We must hold, therefore, that this appeal ought to be allowed, because the plaintiff has no right to inspect this document.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is an action for libel brought against the proprietors of a newspaper, and the libel is set out in the statement of claim. The defendants set up the statutory defence that they had published an apology, that the libel was published without any negligence or malice on their part, and that they have paid money into court as sufficient amends. Issue has been joined on that defence. There cannot be any doubt that the whole of that plea must be proved by the defendants. The plaintiff obtained an order for discovery of documents. In their affidavit in answer the defendants say that they have the manuscript, but that they object to produce it on the ground that it is the original contribution, and is that which was published by them and for which they admit responsibility. The plaintiff claims to have that document produced for his inspection. It is contended that he has a right to inspect it, upon the authority of Bustros v. White (2), because the defendants have admitted by their affidavit the relevancy of the document. I am of opinion that Bustros v. White (2) does not decide that in all cases inspection must be given. In 1893 new rules were added for the express purpose of making it not compulsory on the court to order discovery or inspection in all cases; those are rll. 12 and 18 of Ord. 31. In my opinion it is not obligatory to order inspection in all cases. According to the settled rule of practice, referred to in Hennessy v. Wright (No. 2) (1), the plaintiff is not entitled to be informed as to the writer of a libel. That is the almost invariable practice, and there must be something very special in a case to make any exception to that general rule. I do not see that there is anything special in this case to take it out of the general rule. I think, therefore, that the learned judge at chambers exercised his discretion wrongly and came to a wrong conclusion. This appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. What does the alleged admission of the defendants amount to? It is not an admission that the document is relevant to any issue in the action. It seems to me that in Bustros v. White (2) the relevancy of the document in question was admitted, and that the only question was whether the document was privileged. I think that the decision in that case was only that, where a document is clearly relevant and is not privileged, it must be produced for inspection. At any rate, in Hennessy v. Wright (No. 2) (1) an exception was established in libel cases such as this, and that case is binding upon us. In my opinion we ought not to attempt to refine upon the rule laid down in that case. I also think that the additions to the rules, made in rll. 12 and 18 of Ord. 31, show that production and inspection of documents is not to be ordered ex debito justitiæ in every case, and that it must be shown that the document is in some way relevant to some issue which has to be decided in the case. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be allowed.

After delivery of judgment for the plaintiffs in an action, the defendant became aware of certain documents used in the defence of a previous action, dealing with the same subject-matter, and defended at the cost of the plaintiffs' predecessor in title. The defendant, having appealed, asked the plaintiffs to produce these documents, but the plaintiffs objected, claiming that the documents were privileged. At the hearing of the appeal the defendant asked for production of the documents and the question arose whether they were privileged, and, if so, whether the defendant could give secondary evidence of those of which he had copies.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of HENN COLLINS, J., at the trial of the action without a jury in Middlesex.

A question was raised as to the production of certain documents on which the appellant intended to rely. Since the trial of the action, a number of documents said to relate to the subject-matter of the action, had been discovered at the office of a firm of solicitors, who were the successors of the solicitors to one of the plaintiffs' predecessors in title. These documents consisted of (inter alia) the record of an action of Fry v. Stevens, concerning fishing rights, tried at the Dorchester Assizes in 1786, which was brought against the lessee of the plaintiffs' predecessor, and defended by such predecessor, with proofs of witnesses, and other papers. There was also a list of witnesses, against the names of many of whom was written "ex." There were also notes of witnesses' evidence comprised in six double sheets of foolscap, which contained certain important statements. There was nothing to show how they came into existence, or who took the notes, or that the witnesses were called; but it was stated that they had been prepared for the purpose of the action of Fry v. Stevens. These documents had at one time come into the possession of the defendant from the person in whose custody they were, and, while in his possession, copies of the notes had been taken. The documents were ultimately restored to the plaintiffs. The defendant asked that the documents should be produced, and the questions were: (i) whether they were privileged from production; and (ii) whether, if so, the defendant could give secondary evidence of the documents of which he had copies.

March 11, 1898. SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R.—In the course of this appeal, which is not over yet, a question has arisen as to whether certain documents are privileged, by reason of their being confidential communications, as I will call them; and, if they are, whether secondary evidence can be given of some of them of which the defendant has copies. We must be a little cautious in what we say, because we shall have to consider when they are tendered in evidence each particular document, and it may be that some of these things we are going to allude to are not admissible on other grounds. Therefore, we shall confine our remarks entirely to the question we have heard counsel upon—we mean the professional privilege and the right to give secondary evidence. A

As to that, on looking into the authorities, it appears to us that the case is covered by that of Minet v. Morgan (1), and that if there are any documents which were protected by the privilege to which we are alluding, that privilege has not been lost. I take it that that is a general rule. One may say “once privileged always privileged.” I do not mean to say that privilege cannot be waived; but the mere fact that documents are held, and have not been destroyed, does not amount to a waiver of the privilege. I think Minet v. Morgan (1) covers them in the general way that I am now speaking of. But it was said, “No, Wheeler v. Le Marchant (2) shows the contrary.” I do not think so. It seems to me that Wheeler v. Le Marchant (2) has been a little misunderstood. I think that Wheeler v. Le Marchant (2) is perfectly right. An attempt was there made to extend the doctrine to documents which were not covered upon any proper understanding of the doctrine. When you come to look at COTTON, L.J.’s, judgment in that case and at the form of the order he drew up, I think that will be seen without difficulty at all. B

No doubt Wheeler v. Le Marchant (2) has given rise to a little controversy, and COTTON, L.J., has referred to that in Kennedy v. Lyell (3), where he says (23 Ch.D. at p. 407): C

“What was said by the Master of the Rolls is rather in favour of the respondent, but all that was decided was that communications between the solicitors and the surveyor of the client before any litigation was contemplated were not protected.” D

Then he goes on to other matters. The case was again referred to by DENMAN and CHARLES, J.J., in Lowden v. Blakey (4), where they again pointed out that there was nothing in Wheeler v. Le Marchant (2) that was in any way inconsistent with Minet v. Morgan (1). Nor is there when you come to look at it. Again, STIRLING, J., took a great deal of trouble about Wheeler v. Le Marchant (2), in Learoyd v. Halifax Joint Stock Banking Co. (5). He arrived at the conclusion, which is inevitable when you come to study the two cases, that Wheeler v. Le Marchant (2) was right, and that Minet v. Morgan (1) was right likewise. That is to say, they do not conflict. So far, therefore, Minet v. Morgan (1) may be prayed in aid as protecting those privileged documents. E

Then comes the next question. It appears the defendant has got some copies of them, and is in a position to give secondary evidence of them, and the question is, whether he is entitled to do that. That appears to me to be covered by the authority of Lloyd v. Mostyn (6). I need not go closely into the facts of that case. There was a bond there, the production of which was sought to be privileged on the ground of its coming into the hands of the solicitor in confidence, and the learned judge at the trial allowed the objection, and nobody seems to have quarrelled with it. Then the plaintiff tendered in evidence a copy of the bond and proposed to give secondary evidence of it. The learned judge received the copy as admissible. Sir Fitzroy Kelly moved to enter a nonsuit, if the court should be of opinion that the copy of the bond ought not to have been received in evidence. He referred to PHILLIPPS ON EVIDENCE (8th Edn.), vol. 1, at p. 182, and a decision of BAYLEY, J., at nisi prius was relied upon. I will read the extract from PHILLIPPS ON EVIDENCE: F

A "If a deed deposited confidentially with an attorney has been obtained out of his hands, for the purpose of being produced in evidence by another witness, it cannot be received. Thus, in a case tried before BAYLEY, J., [Fisher v. Hemming (7) tried at the Leicester Lent Assizes, 1809] the plaintiffs' counsel having proved a certain deed in the possession of the defendant, and the defendant refusing to produce it, though he admitted having received notice, the
B counsel of the plaintiffs offered in evidence a copy of the deed, which had been obtained from one who many years ago acted as an attorney for the person under whom the defendant claimed, and who had been intrusted by him with the original deed in his professional character. The counsel on the part of the defendant objected that this evidence ought not to be received, as the original deed had been deposited confidentially with the attorney, and BAYLEY, J., C refused to admit it. He said, the attorney could not give parol evidence of the contents of the deed, which had been intrusted to him; so neither could he furnish a copy. He ought not to have communicated to others what was deposited with him in confidence, whether it was a written or verbal communication. It is the privilege of his client, and continues from first to last."

D In Lloyd v. Mostyn (6) PARKE, B., said (10 M. & W. at pp. 481, 482) :

"I have always doubted the correctness of that ruling. Where an attorney intrusted confidentially with a document communicates the contents of it, or suffers another to take a copy, surely the secondary evidence so obtained may be produced. Suppose the instrument were even stolen, and a correct copy taken, would it not be reasonable to admit it?"

E LORD ABINGER, C.B., said (ibid. at p. 482) : "It is impossible to say this copy was not evidence." The matter dropped there, but the court consisted of LORD ABINGER, PARKE, GURNEY, and ROLFE, BB., and they all concurred in that which I take to be a distinct authority that you can give secondary evidence in a case of this kind.

F The other part of the case refers to the sufficiency of a notice to produce, which I need not trouble about. These, therefore, are the answers which ought to be given to the two questions submitted to us, and when any particular document is tendered we must consider what we ought to do with it, having regard to those principles.

Case Stated by the chairman of the Norfolk Quarter Sessions.

The prisoner was indicted for larceny of certain corn, chaff, sheep, poultry and grass seeds, the property of his master, one Corney. It was stated in the Case that Corney in the presence of a police constable had asked the prisoner how he accounted for the number of the sheep on the farm being less than it should be, and the prisoner then admitted that he had sold a lamb and an ewe to certain persons. In giving his evidence, Corney stated that the prisoner, after making the statement as to the sheep, had, in answer to questions, stated that he had also disposed of certain quantities of corn and chaff. On cross-examination, the prosecutor admitted that he might have said to the prisoner: "You had better tell me about all the corn that is gone." Robert Corney, a nephew of the prosecutor, being called, subsequently stated that the prosecutor had asked the prisoner to speak the truth, saying that "it would be better" for the prisoner to do so. Counsel for the prisoner submitted that these statements of the prisoner as to the corn had been made on his inducement to confess, and were, therefore, not admissible as evidence against him, but the court allowed the whole case to go to the jury, who convicted the prisoner on the whole indictment.

The Crown was not represented.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—In my opinion, this conviction cannot be allowed to stand. The prisoner, who had been employed by a farmer in a more or less confidential capacity, was charged with stealing a variety of articles the property of his master, amongst other things sheep and corn, and was tried at the Norfolk Quarter Sessions. It appears that the prosecutor, having reason to suspect that some of his property had been improperly dealt with, spoke to the prisoner, who then, as to some of the articles, confessed, and confessed voluntarily; but after making this confession, he was pressed to make a full confession, and to confess to having taken the corn. This is clear from the evidence of the prosecutor's nephew, who said that his uncle had asked the prisoner to speak the truth, telling him that it would be better for him if he did.

This amounts to evidence that the confession was not voluntary within the meaning of the authorities. A question of some delicacy then arises as to the course which the magistrates ought to have adopted. It is clear that the evidence ought not to be admitted; but ought the court merely to tell the jury to disregard it, or ought the court to discharge the jury and try the case again? In this case, however, the whole of the evidence was allowed to go to the jury, who found a general verdict. The rule, which is very old, and is stated just as clearly in the old as in the modern authorities, will be found in EAST'S PLEAS OF THE CROWN, Vol. 2 (Edn. 1803), at p. 659. LORD CAMPBELL, in R. v. Baldry (1), admitted a confession made by a prisoner after he had been cautioned by a policeman, because, as is correctly stated in the head-note to the case (21 L.J.M.C. 130),

“the observation of the policeman did not amount to any promise or threat to induce the prisoner to confess so as to render a confession which the latter made after it inadmissible.”

In R. v. Jarvis (2), the prisoner's master said to him,

“You are in the presence of two officers of the police, and I should advise you that to any question that may be put to you you will answer truthfully, so that, if you have committed a fault you may not add to it by stating what is untrue”;

whereupon the prisoner made a confession which the court held to be admissible, WILLES, J., saying that the case would have been different if the master had said, “It is better for you to tell the truth.”

The principle is also laid down by CAVE, J., in R. v. Thompson (3), with the concurrence of LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., that a confession is not admissible if it is preceded by an inducement held out by a person in authority. Seeing, then, that in the case before us there were used the very words which it has been held render a confession inadmissible, in my opinion this confession was not admissible, and, it having been admitted, the conviction which followed it was bad. It is to be borne in mind not only by magistrates, but by prosecuting counsel and by solicitors having the charge of prosecutions, that they must satisfy themselves before putting a confession in evidence that the confession was not obtained under such circumstances as to be inadmissible.

I observe that in this case bail was refused for the prisoner. It cannot be too strongly impressed on the magistracy of the country that bail is not to be withheld as a punishment, but that the requirements as to bail are merely to secure the attendance of the prisoner at the trial.

CALEDONIAN RAIL. CO. v. MULHOLLAND (OR WARWICK)

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Halsbury, L.C., Lord Herschell, Lord Macnaghten, Lord Morris and Lord Shand), November 15, 16, 1897]

Railway—Negligence—Liability of third party—Fatal injury to worker—Defective brake on truck property of third party.

A railway company had a contract to supply coal to some gasworks at D. Trucks belonging to the appellant company were loaded with coal, brought over their line to D., there handed over to the railway company in the ordinary course of business, and hauled by them over a tramway, without being unloaded, to the gasworks, in pursuance of their contract. While the trucks were so being hauled to the gasworks by the railway company, the husband of the respondent, who was in the employment of the company, was killed, in consequence, as was alleged, of a defect in the brake of one of the trucks.

Held: the railway company was not liable, as there was no duty resting on them to the deceased man, a breach of which caused the loss of his life.

Per LORD SHAND: This being neither the case of a trap nor an invitation to use a trap, nor a case of a noxious instrument, and there being no contract or obligation between the deceased man and the appellant company about these waggons, the pursuer had failed to state a relevant ground upon which liability could be founded.

Decision of the Second Division of the Court of Session, 24 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 429, reversed.

Heaven v. Pender (1) (1883), 11 Q.B.D. 503, distinguished.

Notes. Although it is not clearly stated in the judgments in this case, the proper ratio decidendi must be taken to be that there was no liability as "there was ample opportunity for inspection" by the G. company; per LORD ATKIN in *Donoghue (or McAlister) v. Appeal from a decision of a majority of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, consisting of the Lord Justice Clerk (MACDONALD) and LORD YOUNG (LORD TRAYNER dissenting), refusing to dismiss the case as against the appellant railway company in an action brought by the respondent against them and the Glasgow and South-Western Rail. Co., and reported 24 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 429 and 34 Sc. L.R. 317.

The Lord-Advocate (Graham Murray, Q.C.) and E. B. Nicolson (of the Scottish Bar) for the appellants.

Cyril Dodd, Q.C., and C. E. Allan for the respondent.

LORD HERSCHELL.—The question which arises upon this appeal is, whether upon this record there is a case established as against the Caledonian Rail. Co. The action was brought in respect of an accident that happened to a servant of the Glasgow and South-Western Co. by which he lost his life, the action being brought by his widow to recover damages in respect of the loss she had thereby sustained. Not only are the Caledonian Rail. Co. sued, but the Glasgow and South-Western Rail. Co. also, and as against the Glasgow and South-Western Rail. Co. it is not contested that the relevant case is shown upon the pleadings.

The facts that appear upon this record are these. The Caledonian Rail. Co. carried certain coals to the Dumfries station, and, as soon as those coals arrived in the waggons at the Dumfries station, every obligation undertaken by the Caledonian Co. in respect of them was at an end. That was the place of delivery, and the parties might, if they had pleased, have taken delivery of them there; they might have emptied the waggons of their coals at the place where the Caledonian engine left them, and the Caledonian Co., of course, would have had nothing to say to their doing so. But for their own purposes and their own convenience the Glasgow and South-Western Co. made an arrangement with the Dumfries Gas Commissioners by which they were to haul the coals from the place of delivery under the contract with the Caledonian Co., namely, the station, to the premises of the Gas Commissioners, which were about 400 yards, or something like a quarter of a mile distant. Between the place where the Caledonian Co. left the trucks of coal and the premises of the Gas Commissioners there was a tramway passing along the public streets. The trucks were hauled two at a time along this tramway to the Gas Commissioners' premises. While two trucks were being so hauled it is alleged that the husband of the plaintiff lost his life by reason of some imperfection in the brakes connected with these trucks. It became necessary in passing along this tramway to check the motion of the trucks, and the motion of these trucks was not checked rapidly enough to prevent the one coming against the other so that the plaintiff's husband was crushed. It was averred that it was by the permission, sanction, and consent of the Caledonian Co. that the Glasgow and South-Western Co. or the Gas Commissioners did not take delivery of the coals out of the waggons at the station, but hauled those waggons on so that the coals might be discharged direct into the premises of the Gas Commissioners.

The question is, whether these facts establish any duty on the part of the Caledonian Co., a breach of which has led to the damage complained of by the plaintiff. It is said that the duty is this, that the Caledonian Rail. Co. inasmuch as they knew how the Glasgow and South-Western Co. were going to use these waggons, were bound when they handed them over to examine them in order to see that they were in a proper condition, and if they had examined them they would have seen that they were not in a proper condition; they were, therefore, handing over waggons which they had not so examined, and which were not in a proper condition for use by the Glasgow and South-Western Co., and that was a duty which entitled any person in the employment of the Glasgow and South-Western Co., who might be injured while they were being used by the Glasgow and South-Western Co., to sue the Caledonian Rail. Co. if there was a breach of it.

I do not think that any such duty has been established by the arguments of the learned counsel for the respondent. The Caledonian Co. had performed all their obligations when they handed these waggons over, and I think it would be altogether unreasonable to maintain that there was a duty on the part of the Caledonian Co., after they had fulfilled their contract of carriage, to examine these waggons and see that the brakes connected with them were in a fit condition for a subsequent journey on which for their purposes the Glasgow and South-Western Co. were going to haul them into the premises of the Gas Commissioners. With that haulage the Caledonian Rail. Co. had nothing to do—their contract was at an end—it was a new journey along an entirely different railway, and with the incidents of that journey the Caledonian Rail. Co. were altogether unconnected. Can it be said that because they handed the waggons over under the circumstances I have mentioned to the Glasgow and South-Western Rail. Co., they became liable to any workman of the Glasgow and South-Western Rail. Co. who might be injured while the Glasgow and South-Western Rail. Co. were using them on what for this purpose I may call their line and their purposes, because they were not, when they were handed over to the Glasgow and South-Western Rail. Co., in a condition suitable for use on that journey? It seems to me impossible to maintain that there was any such duty owed by the Caledonian Co. to persons in the employment of the Glasgow and South-Western Co. I think, if we were to hold that such an obligation existed, some very strange consequences would ensue—consequences so unreasonable, it seems to me, as to show that the duty cannot exist.

Reliance was placed upon certain authorities to which your Lordships' attention was called, and particularly upon Heaven v. Pender (1). That case really seems to me totally different. There some apparatus of a dock company was being used for what I may call dock purposes. It was part of the facilities which the dock afforded, just as they did by their cranes, their warehouses, or any other appliances, to the vessels that came to use their docks. This particular appliance was in such a condition that a person going upon it, trusting, as he would have a right to trust, that he might go upon it safely because it would bear his weight, was led into what has been called a trap, by which he sustained an injury. He was there upon the invitation of the dock company, and, although it is true that the staging was used for painting a ship, it was part of the appliances, supplied by the dock company for the purposes connected with the carrying on of their business. It was one of the facilities given by which they induced vessels to use their docks that they did supply these appliances. It was said that they had invited the plaintiff to come upon that staging, and that they were responsible if the man so invited was led into the trap by means of which he was injured. That was Heaven v. Pender (1). I am quite unable to see that that case has any application to the present case at all. This waggon at the time that it was being used was being used on a new journey initiated by the Glasgow and South-Western Co. for their purposes, and there was nothing in it which can be said to be comparable to a trap created by or permitted to exist by the Caledonian Co., into which they invited and led the deceased man to come. Therefore, Heaven v. Pender (1) seems to me entirely without application to the present case.

As I have said, I am quite unable to see any duty resting upon the Caledonian Co. to the deceased man, a breach of which has caused the loss of his life, and, consequently, given rise to a right of action in the plaintiff. In the Court of Session there was a difference of opinion between the learned judges. The majority were of opinion that this statement—these condescendences—did show that there was a case, and judgment was given accordingly by LORD YOUNG, in which the Lord Justice Clerk concurred. With all respect, I think that the judgment of LORD YOUNG is founded on the supposition that it was enough if there might have been a contract under which the Caledonian Co. were under some obligation during the haulage of these waggons, and that there being an uncertainty whether there was such a contract or not, the case ought to go to trial to see whether there was such a contract, because he says it is absurd to suppose that they were led by favour and affection to let their waggons be used, and therefore, they must have been used under some contract. That, I think, is what was in the learned judge's mind—it is only in that sense that I can interpret his language and appreciate the view which he has taken. But I think that it is for the plaintiff to make out a relevant case. If it rests upon a contract, though we may not know what has passed between the parties, and it may be a matter of speculation, still, if a contract is necessary to a relevant case, then a contract must be alleged, and of course it may be that the plaintiff will not succeed in proving it. But in the present case I can find nothing alleged in the whole of this claim to show that any responsibility rested upon the Caledonian Railway Co. after they had delivered the goods at the station, or that they had anything to do, or any sort of connection with the haulage which took place afterwards from the station to the works of the Gas Commissioners.

For these reasons I think that the judgment must be reversed. I may add that the Lord Chancellor desires me to say that he takes entirely the same view. I move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be reversed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I quite agree.

LORD MORRIS.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD SHAND.—The Caledonian Rail. Co., one of the set of defenders in this case, have maintained that they are not bound to submit to a trial on this claim, and in arrest of the proceedings they have maintained that the pursuers have made no statement relevant in law to infer the liability which is alleged against them. I agree with your Lordships in holding that that plea is well founded, and that the action, so far as the Caledonian Rail. Co. is concerned, ought to be dismissed.

In the pursuer's statement it is not alleged that any relation whatever subsisted between her deceased husband and the appellants the Caledonian Rail. Co. There was no such relation as employer or employed, or in any other way. The deceased husband of the pursuer was a servant, not of the Caledonian Rail. Co., but of the Glasgow and South-Western Rail. Co., in whose employment he was. He was acting under their orders in the matter which led to this accident. So far as the Caledonian Co. were concerned he was an outsider or a stranger to them in every sense of the term.

It appears from the pursuer's statement that the only part that the Caledonian Co. took in reference to the use of these waggons was this—that they, under a contract of carriage which they had entered into, carried the coal in their waggons from its place of departure (I do not know that it is very distinctly stated where that was) to its place of destination, and that place of destination was Dumfries. The moment the waggons arrived, hauled by the Caledonian Co. under that contract of carriage into the station at Dumfries, and were placed in the station of the Glasgow and South-Western Co. there, the Caledonian Co. had done with their contract. It appears, however, that a separate arrangement was made for a subsequent journey. I call it a journey, although it was short in distance—it might have been a matter of twenty or thirty miles, but it so happens that it was not so long, but was only a distance of 300 or 400 yards through the streets of Dumfries to the works of the Dumfries Gas Commissioners. But for this separate journey, as I call it, there was a separate undertaking between two different parties. I mean between the Dumfries Gas Commissioners, to whom the coals belonged which were carried on their behalf, and the Glasgow and South-Western Co. It was in the execution of that contract of carriage between the Gas Commissioners and the Glasgow and South-Western Co. that this unfortunate man, an employé of the Glasgow and South-Western Co., met with the accident which led to the action. The only connection, as it appears to me, which the Caledonian Co. had with this matter after delivering the waggons at the station was that they were the owners of the waggons. Beyond that I can see nothing which can be suggested to fix responsibility upon them.

It is true, as has been pointed out and pressed upon your Lordships' consideration, that in the pursuer's statement it is averred that, "as regards the coal conveyed by the defenders, the Caledonian Rail. Co., for the Dumfries Gas Commissioners as consignees," that is, coal carried by them to Dumfries,

"it is, and for many years has been, the regular practice for the said defenders to give the use of the waggons belonging to them, in which coal has been carried from coal pits on their system of railway to Dumfries station, for the conveyance of the coal from the station to the gasworks without necessity for any transshipment."

That simply means that, there being an arrangement by which the Glasgow and South-Western Co. are to carry the coals on from the Dumfries station to the Gas Commissioners' premises, the Caledonian Co., in order to avoid the inconvenience of the transhipment of the coal, give the use of their waggons to the Glasgow and South-Western Co. What is said to follow from that is stated in the preceding sentence, a sentence which, logically speaking, ought to follow what I have now read,

"In these circumstances it is the duty and is the practice of the Caledonian Rail. Co. and other railway companies to take care that waggons, of which such use is given, are in proper working order, with a view to the safety of those who may have occasion to use and handle them in the loading, unloading, and delivery of the coal."

It is all very well to aver that to be a duty, but a pursuer in circumstances such as these is bound not merely to say that there is a duty, but to give the grounds from which that legal duty is to be inferred, and the only ground upon which that duty is said to be inferred is set forth in the clause which I have already read, saying that the Caledonian Co. have been in the habit of giving the use of the waggons.

It is very clear to my thinking that the giving the use of waggons can infer no such duty. If there was any duty at all upon the Caledonian Co. as in a question with the pursuer's deceased husband, it appears to me that it would have been a duty really to give sound waggons, such waggons that if an accident happened from them the Caledonian Rail. Co. should only be excused on the ground of a latent defect which could not be discovered. But I can see no ground whatever for holding that, having parted with the waggons at the station, and having nothing to do with the contract of carriage subsequently, which might have been for a long or a short journey, there was a duty upon the Caledonian Co., in a question with a stranger to them, to have their waggons either in a sound condition or examined with care.

It may or may not be that the Caledonian Co. had some duty towards the Glasgow and South-Western Co.—when I say "some duty" I mean some obligation—under a separate contract, but with that we have nothing to do here, because there is no such contract alleged in the first place, and even if there were, I do not think that the husband of the plaintiff could have taken the benefit of it. I notice, as LORD HERSCHELL has said, that there seems to have been a good deal of discussion, or rather consideration, in the Court of Session, on the part of LORD YOUNG and LORD TRAYNER, who gave the conflicting decisions, whether the averment which I have read amounts to an averment that the carriages were lent by the one company to the other, or that there was some valuable consideration given for the use of them. But whether it be loan gratuitous, or whether it be a use given for payment of money, that is a transaction entirely between the two railway companies—we hear nothing about it here—we cannot look at it—but whatever that transaction may be, whether it might be such as would infer an obligation upon the part of the Caledonian Co. as in a question with the Glasgow and South-Western Co. to furnish sound waggons or to examine the waggons, whether it be such a stipulation as would possibly give the Glasgow and South-Western Co. a right to relief in the case of a claim such as is here made, if it were successful, in the court below, it certainly is a question which cannot arise here. There is one thing that is quite clear, and that is, that whatever the arrangement between the two companies one with the other might be, that would never give a stranger to the Caledonian Rail. Co.—a mere servant of the Glasgow and South-Western Rail. Co.—a direct right of action against the Caledonian Rail. Co. in circumstances such as these.

The only possible view upon which I think such an action as this could have been maintained was that pressed upon us in the case to which your Lordships have already referred, of Heaven v. Pender (1), but I agree in thinking, upon the ground which has been stated, that that case has really no application to the present. The particular defect complained of there was in a part of the general works which the dock company was obliged to keep up, and that being so, the general rule that the dock owners would be responsible for their gangways and other appliances within the dockyard is sufficient to explain the decision arrived at in that case. Nor, as was suggested by the Lord-Advocate, is it a case in which you can say that it was an instrument noxious or dangerous in itself, which might produce an accident from the mere handling of it. It is not a case of that kind where it may be that wider and other responsibilities might arise. This being neither the case of a trap nor an invitation to use a trap, nor a case of noxious instrument, and there being no contract or obligation between the pursuer's husband and the Caledonian Rail. Co. about these waggons, I am of opinion with your Lordships that we should hold that the pursuer in this case has failed to state a relevant ground upon which liability can be founded, and that, therefore, this appeal should be sustained and the interlocutor reversed with costs.

Hereditaments were conveyed to trustees upon trust to permit M. to reside there rent free for as long as she might wish, the trustees being given power to raise money by mortgage of the premises or any other reasonable means.

Held: (i) M. had the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1882; (ii) the trustees were not the trustees for the purposes of the Act.

Notes. The Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, have been repealed and replaced by the Settled Land Act, 1925. Summons to determine whether under the provisions of an indenture (i) Mary S. S. Carne was tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts of the St. Donats estate, which she was entitled to occupy for life, and (ii) whether the trustees of the indenture were trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts.

By an indenture of voluntary settlement dated Mar. 14, 1890, and expressed to be made between Mansel Sydney Berkrolles Nicholl Carne (thereinafter called Mansel Carne) of the first part, John Devereux Van Loder Nicholl Carne of the second part, and Mary Salisbury Stradling Carne and John Stockwood of the third part, it was witnessed that Mansel Carne conveyed to John D. V. L. N. Carne and his heirs, first—the Castle of St. Donats and the Manor of St. Donats, in the county of Glamorgan, and the rectory and parsonage of the parish church of St. Donats, in the said county, with all the tithes, profits, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, and the advowson of the vicarage of the said church; and, secondly, the several messuages, or tenements, lands and hereditaments, situate in the several parishes of St. Donats, Llantwit Major, and Marcross, in the said county, which contain by admeasurement 1,132a. 1r. 8p., or thereabouts, to the use and intent that Mary S. S. Carne might thenceforth during her life receive an annual rentcharge of £50 to be issuing out of the said premises, and subject to and charged with the said annual rentcharge to the use of Mary S. S. Carne and John Stockwood, their executors, administrators, or assigns, for the term of 1,000 years from the date of the said indenture upon the trusts thereafter declared concerning the same, and from and after the determination of the said term, and in the meantime subject thereto and to the trusts thereof to the use of John D. V. L. Carne, his heirs, and assigns.

It was by the indenture agreed and declared that Mary S. S. Carne and John Stockwood, their executors, administrators, and assigns, should stand possessed of the premises, comprised in the term of 1,000 years upon trust in the first place to allow Mary S. S. Carne to occupy St. Donats Castle aforesaid, with the pleasure grounds, gardens, stable, coach-houses, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, and also six fields on the said St. Donats estate rent free for so long as she might wish to continue to do so, and upon further trust out of the rents and profits of the said premises, or by any other reasonable ways and means, to raise and pay the succession duty therein mentioned, and also upon trust by mortgage of the said premises or out of the rents and profits thereof, or by any other reasonable ways and means, to raise and pay the principal sum of £680 therein mentioned and all interest thereon, and upon further trust by the ways and means aforesaid and at such time or times as the trustees should think fit to raise the sum of £40,000, and to apply the same in discharge of a mortgage debt therein mentioned to the extent that the hereditaments subject thereto should be discharged therefrom. The indenture contained a covenant by Mansel Carne to permit M. S. S. Carne so long as she chose to live at St. Donats Castle, to use and enjoy all the plate, furniture, and effects, in and about or belonging to St. Donats Castle, and the stables, coach-houses, outbuildings and pleasure grounds thereto, and if after the death of Mary S. S. Carne, or of her ceasing to live at St. Donats Castle, John D. V. L. N. Carne should choose to live there to permit him while living there to enjoy the plate, furniture, and effects, but so that neither of them should be at liberty to remove the same or any part thereof therefrom.

Mary S. S. Carne entered into possession of the St. Donats Castle, with the gardens and fields belonging thereto, and was still in possession thereof. The present trustees of the indenture were Mary S. S. Carne and Matthew Peake. Various questions arose with respect to the rights of Mary S. S. Carne and John D. V. L. N. Carne, under the above stated indenture, and on April 5, 1898, an action was commenced by the trustees against John D. V. L. N. Carne, for the determination of the above questions.

NORTH, J.—I do not see how to distinguish this case from Re Eastman's Settled Estates (1), before ROMER, J. I think that a gift of such an interest as this is a gift of an estate for life determinable by a conditional limitation. I do not think the question is whether any estate is given. [His LORDSHIP then referred to a passage in COKE UPON LITTLETON, 42a, respecting conditions annexed to estates, and also to BURTON ON REAL PROPERTY (7th Edn.), p. 236, where it is stated "a condition at common law may be annexed to an estate for life as well as to a fee simple," and continued:] As tenant for life Mrs. Carne has the power of selling the property of which she is tenant for life. With respect to the question whether that is what was intended by the settlor, when the power of sale and other powers were conferred on tenants for life by the Settled Land Act, 1882, it was considered that the benefits to be derived from the exercise by them of these powers exceeded the possible disadvantage of their defeating the intentions of settlors. I will refer the matter to chambers for the appointment of trustees of the settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts.

There will be a declaration that Mrs. Carne is tenant for life within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts; and the court being of opinion that the plaintiffs are not trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, refer the matter to chambers to appoint such trustees.

Negligence of contractor—Liability of employer.*

The defendants were lawfully laying telephone wires under a highway, and for this purpose made trenches in which were laid tubes through which the wires were carried. The tubes were joined together with soldered joints, and the defendants employed to do this work a plumber who, in doing the work used a benzoline flare lamp. For use in the work there was a pot of molten solder on the footway, and a man employed by the plumber, as was usual and ordinary, dipped the lamp into the molten solder in order to heat it and obtain a flare. Owing to a defect in the lamp it exploded, and molten solder flew out and injured the plaintiff who was passing along the footway. In an action for damages brought by the plaintiff against the defendants, A

Held: there was a duty cast upon the defendants to take care that the public were protected from injury caused by any act of negligence by the person employed to carry out the work on the highway, and, therefore, they were liable to the plaintiff for damages.

Appeal by the plaintiff from the decision of the Divisional Court (WILLS and LAWRENCE, JJ.) allowing an appeal from a decision of the deputy judge of the City of London Court in an action by the plaintiff to recover damages from the defendant company for personal injuries.

The defendants were engaged in laying telephone wires under the footway of a street in London, and were acting lawfully in so doing. Tubes were laid in a trench under the footway, and the wires were carried through these tubes. The tubes were joined together by each one being fitted into the socket of the one next to it, the socketed joints being finished off with molten lead or solder. The defendant company employed a plumber to finish off these joints with lead or solder under a written agreement that the plumber would connect with wiped joints and seam to the satisfaction of the defendants' foreman in charge of the work, for the sum of 12s. for each connection. The work of making these connections was done under the supervision of the defendants' manager, and there was evidence that a servant of the defendant assisted in the work. The lead or solder was melted in an iron pot with a fire underneath it, which was on the footway, and was ladled out of the pot and run into the joints. In order to do the work it was necessary to have a flare from a benzoline lamp. This flare could not be obtained without the application of heat to the lamp. A man employed by the plumber was using a benzoline lamp H I for the purpose of the work. The lamp had a safety valve, which was necessary to prevent danger of explosion. This safety valve was out of order, as the man ought to have known. In order to heat the lamp, the man dipped it into the pot of molten solder which was upon the pavement, and, in consequence of the defective safety valve, the lamp exploded, and the molten metal flew out and injured the plaintiff who was passing along the footway. It was proved that it was the ordinary and usual course to dip the lamp into the molten metal in order to obtain a flare.

The deputy judge of the City of London Court found that the plumber was a servant of the defendants, or that work was being done as a joint operation by the defendants and the plumber; that the workman was doing the work in the usual and ordinary way; and that the workman was negligent. Judgment was given for the plaintiff for £25 damages. The defendants appealed, and the Divisional Court (WILLS and LAWRENCE, JJ.) allowed the appeal and ordered judgment to be entered for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed with leave.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C.—I am of opinion that the decision of the Divisional Court was erroneous, and that the decision of the learned county court judge was right. I think that it is clear that upon the evidence the decision of the learned county court judge can be supported upon two different grounds. I think that there was evidence that the work which was being done was being done jointly by the two parties and not solely by an independent contractor employed by the defendants, and that both parties would be responsible if the operations were negligently performed. Further, this interference with a public highway would not be lawful unless it was properly authorised. In this case it was properly authorised by the local authority. There was a duty cast upon the person thus interfering with the highway to take care that the public were protected from any act of negligence by the person employed to do the work.

In this case a person was employed to solder the joints of the tubes. For that purpose it was necessary to use molten lead in doing the work, and to have it upon the spot where the work was being done. It has also been found as a fact that it was usual, as the defendants must have well known, to put the blow-lamp into the cauldron of molten lead. If the lamp was in good order that operation would be perfectly harmless; but if the lamp was out of order there would necessarily be an explosion. Therefore there was an operation to be performed which might in the ordinary course of things cause an explosion if proper care was not taken. Can it, then, be contended that the defendants were under no obligation to the public to take care that members of the public were not injured by that operation? In my opinion such a contention is unarguable. I think, therefore, that the decision of the learned county court judge was right, and this appeal must be allowed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I agree. I think that the decision of the learned county court judge was quite right. I agree with the Lord Chancellor that there was evidence that this was a joint operation by the plumber and the defendants which justified the findings of the county court judge. I think also that the other point is conclusive as to the liability of the defendants. This work was being done upon a public highway, and it was clearly dangerous work in which molten lead was being used and a benzoline blow-lamp. The defendants, therefore, were delegating the performance of dangerous work to the plumber. The plumber while doing the work—as has been found by the county court judge—did that which would ordinarily and usually be done when he put the blow-lamp into the pot of molten lead. The lamp was not in proper order, and an explosion took place by which the lead was scattered and the plaintiff was injured. The plaintiff sued the defendants for damages, and the defendants set up the defence that they had employed an independent contractor to do the work, and that therefore they were not liable.

I am of opinion that, according to the principle established in Hughes v. Percival (1) and Black v. Christchurch Finance Co. (2), where a person is executing work upon a public highway, he cannot escape liability by employing an independent contractor, because there is a duty cast upon him to see that the work upon the highway is so carried out as not to injure persons who are using the highway. I cannot agree with the view of WILLS and LAWRENCE, JJ., in the court below, that the using of molten lead upon the highway in this way comes within any possible view of what is called casual or collateral negligence. I agree, therefore, that the decision of the learned county court judge was right, and that the decision of the Divisional Court was wrong.

WHEELER v. HUMPHREYS

[HOUSE OF LORDS (The Earl of Halsbury, L.C., Lord Macnaghten, Lord Morris and Lord James of Hereford), April 22, July 4, 1898]

Will—Hotchpot clause—Covenant to settle sum with son's marriage trustees six months after death of testator—Reversionary interest retained by testator—Residuary estate left equally between son and daughter—Testator's reversionary interest dealt with according to will.

On his son's marriage the testator covenanted with the trustees of the marriage settlement that his executors should within six months of his death pay £10,000 to be held in trust for the son for life, with remainder to the son's wife for life, and after death of the survivor then as to capital for the issue of the marriage and in default of issue the capital to be held in trust for the testator absolutely. By his will the testator provided that all sums which he had given or covenanted to give to a child on marriage should be taken in or towards satisfaction of that child's share under the will and be brought into hotchpot. The testator left his residuary estate equally between his son and daughter. After the death of the testator in 1886, his executors divided the residuary estate equally, treating the £10,000 as part of the son's share. In 1894 the son died without issue.

Held: the testator's reversionary interest in the £10,000 was not subject to the hotchpot clause, and the only fair way to effect an equal division between the son and the daughter was for the trustees specifically to appropriate and allot to the son's share the testator's contingent reversionary interest under the ultimate trust, not under the hotchpot clause, but under the terms of the will; accordingly the son's executors were entitled to the £10,000, subject to the life interest of the son's widow.

Gadsden*, reversing a decision of CHITTY, J., on the construction and effect of a hotchpot clause in the will of Robert Arnold Cosier, who died in December, 1886.

The appellants were the testator's daughter and her children and the respondents were the executors of the testator's son who died without issue in June, 1894. The question for determination was whether, in the events which had happened, a sum of £10,000 which the testator had covenanted to settle on his son at his marriage in 1885, was held by the settlement trustees on trust for the respondents, or as part of the testator's residuary estate, in which case the appellants were entitled to a share.

The House took time for consideration.

July 4, 1898. The following opinion was read.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The testator, at the time when he made his will, was a widower with only two children—a son and a daughter—both of whom were then married. By his will he directs his executors and trustees to convert his whole estate into money, and to stand possessed of the clear residue in trust for his two children in equal shares. After settling the daughter's share and giving his trustees various powers, including a power specifically to appropriate and allot any part of his estate in or towards satisfaction of the respective shares thereinbefore given or settled, he declares his will as follows :

"Provided also, and I declare that any and all sums of money, annuities or annual sums and property which I have already covenanted or agreed to give or which I may hereafter covenant or agree to give to or with any child of mine on his or her marriage shall, in default of any direction to the contrary in writing under my hand, be taken in or towards satisfaction of the respective share of such child . . . and shall be brought into hotchpot and accounted for accordingly."

In the case of the daughter there was nothing to be brought into hotchpot. In the case of the son the testator had covenanted with the trustees of the son's marriage settlement that his executors would pay to them the sum of £10,000 to be invested and held upon trust for the son for life with remainder for the son's wife for life, with remainder as to the capital for the children of the marriage. In case there should be no child (as in the event happened) the capital was to be held in trust for the settlor absolutely. The clear residue of the testator's estate without providing for this sum of £10,000 amounted, roughly speaking, to £52,000. Taking it at that sum, how ought the amount to have been dealt with?

The first question seems to be, what was the effect of the father's covenant? What did it give to the son? It gave him a life interest in the investments representing the £10,000. Then it gave a life interest to the son's wife, and further it gave the capital to the issue of the marriage in the event of there being any issue to take. For the purposes of the will it seems to me that it would be only reasonable to hold that, whatever was coming to the son's wife and the children of the marriage under the covenant, was a marriage gift to the son. What was given was in substance given to the son to be enjoyed by him by means of a settlement on himself, his wife and children. But there the gift to the son ends. The interest which the father retained or reserved was not given to the son in any sense. It would, therefore, have been wrong to require the son to bring the whole £10,000 into hotchpot in every event. And the testator has not done so. A

Counsel for the appellants, did not contend that the £10,000 was to be brought into hotchpot as a gift to the son. They argued that the whole fund was to be brought into hotchpot as a gift with the son. That, if I may venture to say so, is the mistake which the learned judge of first instance makes. He observes :

“The truth is that the testator has not referred in this hotchpot clause to the trusts of the £10,000, but what he has directed to be brought into account is the £10,000 which he gave with his son.” B

I cannot agree with that observation. The reference in the will is a reference to the trusts of the £10,000, so far as they enured for the benefit of the son, and to nothing else. Surely the testator must have been referring to the beneficial interest in the gift, not to the legal ownership of the fund which was designed to protect that interest. A gift is a gift, whether it be given directly, or given through the medium of a trust. What the donor keeps back is no gift. C

I do not understand the expression, “given with any child of mine,” as applied to a provision on behalf of a son. It obviously applies to a provision on behalf of a daughter. You give your daughter in marriage and you give a portion with your daughter. That is a common expression, and correct enough, because the portion is given to or for the benefit of the person to whom the daughter is given. In the marriage service the question is asked, “Who giveth this woman to be married to this man?” A corresponding question applied to the other contracting party, even nowadays, I presume, would be thought inappropriate. It appears to me that it would be equally inappropriate to refer to money settled on behalf of the intended husband as given with him. The contention on the part of the appellants involves a contradiction. It requires an object of the testator’s bounty to give credit for something which never was his, and then it treats that very thing as belonging absolutely and for all purposes to the testator himself. This contention seems to have had its origin in a misapplication of the testator’s words. Not that that misapplication can really make any difference. The contingent interest reserved by the settlor is no more given with the son (if anybody prefers that way of looking at it) than given to the son. It was not given at all. The settlor kept it. D E F

The courts below agree in thinking that the sum of £10,000 which the testator covenanted to pay to the trustees of his son’s marriage settlement must be brought into account under the hotchpot clause en bloc and without reserve. There, however, they part company. In the first court it was held that the hotchpot clause could have no further operation. The contingent interest under the ultimate trust in the settlement remained the father’s property; as such it would have to be divided equally between the son and the daughter when it fell into possession. The result was unexpected but inevitable. The Court of Appeal are more fortunate in finding a way of escape. By inverting the hotchpot clause they arrive at a correct result. The whole fund, they say, must be brought into hotchpot by the son. It has, therefore to be taken towards satisfaction of his share; the direction that it is to be so taken implies a gift, and, therefore, whatever interest the father retained in the fund is given to the son by the hotchpot clause, as RIGBY, L.J., thinks, or as the other members of the Court hold, by the conjoint operation of that clause, and the gift in the earlier part of the will. G H I

I must say I cannot follow this reasoning. It seems to me plain that the testator’s reversionary interest in the fund cannot come under the operation of the hotchpot clause. That clause has nothing to do with it. Nothing was to be brought into hotchpot but what the testator had covenanted or agreed to give. The hotchpot clause is in the common form. The language used must have its ordinary effect. The simplest way of looking at the matter is to put oneself in the position of the executors when they came to divide the estate. They had £52,000 in hand and no liability to meet but the claim of the settlement trustees. The first thing to be done was to pay the trustees. The trustees got their £10,000. Against that a like sum was set apart for the daughter's share. I pause there, for the division of the rest of the estate cannot give rise to any difficulty. The surplus, whatever it is, may be disregarded for the purpose of considering the present question. I ask what is the result of what the executors have done so far? Equality if the testator's interest under the ultimate trust has been appropriated to the son; inequality if that interest is to be regarded as still the father's property. If that mistake is made the daughter has certainly received too much.

As no one suggests, or ever has suggested, that the beneficial interests under the prior trusts are not to be brought into hotchpot, it is obvious that the daughter has received too much by the exact amount or value of the testator's reversionary interest. How is the mistake to be set right? Simply by doing now what ought to have been done before anything was set apart for the daughter. You must specifically appropriate and allot to the son's share the testator's contingent reversionary interest under the ultimate trust. But that is to be done not under the hotchpot clause, but under the plain directions in the earlier part of the will. It is the only way to effect an equal division between the son and the daughter. Whenever the interest of a legatee, together with the interest, if any, of the testator in a particular fund or a particular property exhausts the whole beneficial interest therein, and the legatee has to bring his interest into hotchpot, the appropriation of the fund or property in or towards satisfaction of the legatee's share or legacy under the will necessarily involves bringing the legatee's interest into hotchpot, and at the same time deals with the testator's interest, if any, in conformity with his directions in regard to his own property. The son is now dead without issue, and the whole of the £10,000 belongs to the son's estate absolutely subject only to the life estate of his widow.

The result of the view put forward on behalf of the appellants is certainly startling. Whereas the testator directed that his residuary estate should be divided in equal shares between his two children, the son gets £10,000 less than the daughter. The result might have been more startling still. The residuary estate, without providing for the £10,000, might have been only £20,000. That is an event which the testator seems to have contemplated as at least possible, because he directs that what he had covenanted to give to his son should be taken either towards satisfaction or in satisfaction of his son's share under the will. The son's wife might have died without issue in her husband's lifetime, and then, according to the view of the appellants' counsel, the testator's endeavour to produce equality would result in this—the son living and in a position to marry again would get £5,000, and the daughter would carry off £15,000. Suppose, further, that the bequest to the son had been a definite sum of £10,000 instead of being a share of residue, and suppose the ultimate residue had been given to someone else, an eldest son for instance, the son, who was advanced in the testator's lifetime, living and in a position to marry again, would have taken nothing but a life estate. I agree with SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R., that such a result does suggest that there must be some error somewhere. But I desire to rest my judgment on the plain language of the will without putting any strained construction on any words in the hotchpot clause or giving it a peculiar or unusual effect. I think that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Applicability of cy-près doctrine.*

A friendly society was formed in 1800 for the relief of sick and distressed members, their widows and children. In 1893 a legacy of £500 was bequeathed to the society by a testator, at whose death there was only one member of the society alive, and three annuitants, two of whom since died. The annuity of the remaining annuitant was amply covered by funds of the society in court.

Held: (i) the society, not being founded and maintained on actuarial principles and not being a business-like arrangement, was concerned with the relief of poverty and thus was a charitable institution; (ii) as the society, although moribund, was in existence at the date of the testator's death, the legacy had not lapsed, but was applicable cy-près.

Originating Summons to determine whether a certain institution was in existence at the date of the testator's death and if so whether a legacy to it should lapse or be applied cy-près for charitable purposes.

I

Thomas Buck, who died on Jan. 8, 1893, by his will dated June 28, 1884, bequeathed "to the Commercial Travellers' Society, whose office is at 17, Philpot Lane, City," the sum of £500 free from legacy duty, directing that "the said charitable legacy" and the duty thereon should be paid out of his pure personal estate, and declaring that the receipt of the treasurer for the time being of the society should be an effectual discharge for the charitable legacy. His residuary estate was devised and bequeathed by the testator to the trustees of his will upon the trusts therein mentioned and in favour of his children. The Commercial Travellers' Society was established as a friendly society in the City of London on Jan. 27, 1800, and its office was at 17, Philpot Lane, City. By the rules of the society, as certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies in 1832, it was provided inter alia :

“(1.) The object of this society being to provide a fund for the relief of sick and distressed members, their widows and children in the manner hereinafter mentioned, it is agreed that this society shall be denominated the Commercial Travellers' Society, and shall consist of the principals of houses in trade both in town and country who employ travellers, and of persons actually employed as travellers. (2.) That the affairs of this society shall be entrusted to the management of a committee of not less than twenty. . . . (3.) That the said committee shall choose a president, one or more vice-presidents, a treasurer, and a secretary annually at every general meeting . . . (6.) That every person chosen a member whose age shall be under twenty-five years shall . . . either pay to the secretary for the use of the society the sum of twenty-one pounds . . . as a subscription for life, or the sum of two guineas annually, and if such member's age shall be twenty-five and under thirty years he shall pay in like manner . . . the sum of thirty-one pounds, ten shillings, as a life subscription, or the sum of three guineas annually . . . (11.) That the secretary . . . do pay the subscriptions of members and donations to the society into the hands of the treasurer . . . (13.) That the sum of twenty thousand pounds sterling, which shall become and remain the permanent fund of this society, shall be invested by the treasurer . . . pursuant to the Friendly Societies Act, 1829 [repealed], ss. 13, 31, in the names of the trustees on behalf of the society . . . (14.) That in case a member shall be afflicted with sickness, so as to render him incapable of employment, and in distressed circumstances, or shall become infirm, or meet with any other infirmity, which may in the opinion of the committee, render him an object deserving the assistance of the society, he shall be entitled, at the discretion of the committee, to a sum not exceeding one guinea per week during the time he shall so remain sick and distressed or such fit object as aforesaid . . . (15.) That in case a member shall die and shall leave a widow . . . and one or more child or children in distressed circumstances, the said widow, . . . shall receive a sum not exceeding twenty pounds per annum for herself, at the discretion of the committee, and in like manner a further sum not exceeding five pounds per annum for each child . . . and the said widow at the time of making her claim for relief . . . shall exhibit to the committee . . . a just and true account of the property and effects of her late husband at the time of his decease . . . and if such member shall die, leaving a child or children in distressed circumstances, and no widow surviving him . . . each such child shall be entitled to a sum not exceeding ten pounds per annum, at the discretion of the committee . . . (17.) All moneys arising from contributions and fines shall be applied to the purposes in these rules mentioned . . .”

The funds of the society were added to by donations in addition to the regular subscriptions of the members.

On July 28, 1888, the three surviving trustees of the society paid into court the trust funds of the society, then amounting to £5,101, stating that, including themselves there were only five members of the society in existence and six annuitants, that no list of members later than 1838 was discoverable, that no new members had been admitted since 1850, and no general meeting held since 1871, and no subscription received since 1874, and that two of the trustees were the only members of the committee surviving. They further stated that in consequence of the impossibility of holding meetings of the members the society could not be dissolved under the Friendly Society Act, 1875 [repealed], and if it could be the persons entitled to the trust funds could not be ascertained. At the date of the testator's death in 1893, John Brunt Mackay was the only surviving trustee and member of the committee and of the society, the last member but one having died in 1892. There were three annuitants living, of whom in 1896 one only was left, namely, Harriet Lucy Cage, who was entitled to the receipt of an annuity of £32 per annum. The funds of the society now in court amounted to £4,836 India Three per Cent. Stock and £320 in cash.

The trustees and executors of the testator, before paying over the legacy of £500, took out this originating summons on May 18, 1896, against John Brunt Mackay and Harriet Cage, the residuary legatees of the testator, and the Attorney-General, by which they asked for the determination of the questions: (i) whether the Commercial Travellers' Society was so existing at the date of the testator's death as to have become entitled to the legacy of £500 or was not so existing as aforesaid; (ii) whether if the society was so existing the said legacy ought to be paid into court, or how otherwise the same ought to be dealt with; (iii) whether if in the opinion of the court the society was not so existing as aforesaid the said legacy ought to be treated as lapsed and fallen into the residuary estate of the testator, or ought to be applied cy-près for charitable purposes.

KEKEWICH, J.—There are two questions falling for decision wholly independent each of the other. The first is, whether the Commercial Travellers' Society, whose office is at No. 17, Philpot Lane, City, to which society, through the treasurer for the purposes of the society, the testator gives £500, is a charity within the ordinary doctrine of the court as expounded by the House of Lords in Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs. v. Pemsel (2). That is the first question, and until we have decided that we cannot make any progress with the other.

If I were uncontrolled by decision (I am only speaking provisionally), the tendency of my opinion would be to hold this a charity. Am I controlled by decision? It seems to me not. Cunnack v. Edwards (1) and all the other cases which have been cited, all dwell on the absence of the ingredient of poverty in persons who are entitled to the benefit of the institution. LORD HERSCHELL, in giving judgment in Cunnack v. Edwards (1), speaks of the society he there had to consider as "a perfectly business-like arrangement," and this society has been described argumentatively as a mutual insurance society. If this is a case of perfectly business-like arrangement—if it is a mutual insurance society, then it seems to me that, not only am I bound by authority, but it is a case that would clearly, reasonably, and fairly fall outside the definition of charity. It has been pointed out that this society has been maintained and has reached its present position, which is one, at least, of perfect solvency, not merely by subscriptions of members, whether life members or annual members, whose subscriptions would be a certain fixed sum, but by donations or voluntary subscriptions, donations either by living persons or sums which have been derived from donations by will. That, at any rate, is a matter not to be forgotten, and perhaps it is of some importance; but it is by no means to my mind conclusive that this is a charity, taking it into consideration in connection with other things.

It is obvious, I think, on the face of these rules that this is not a society formed and maintained on actuarial principles. That is true of a very large number of societies either charitable or in the nature of mutual insurance societies. We are all acquainted with some most excellent institutions of that character which could not have been maintained and kept solvent but for large donations. It is those donations which enable such societies to start and be maintained in a solvent condition. I am not sure about the society in Cunnack v. Edwards (1), but certainly many of those which have been mentioned and certainly this, were not founded on actuarial principles. It depended upon adventitious aid—donations by those who did not themselves desire to have any benefit from the society. That is really why it is not of so much importance that there were donations at all. They are for a different purpose. They are to raise the level of the benefits which ought in a perfectly business-like arrangement, if I may borrow the words of LORD HERSCHELL, to be arrived at by actuarial calculations. Then having got this fund, it is to be applied in payment of certain annuities, annuities of £20 to widows, and £5 to children. I am leaving out members altogether. Widows are to take £20 each with children, and the children are to take £10 each when they are motherless as well as fatherless. I do not see any provision that that is to be varied with the funds of the society. It is nothing like calculated, as far as I can see, that the funds would give those annuities from time to time. For that, no doubt, the society depended very much on their outside subscriptions. So that it is not a mutual insurance society. It is not, as it seems to me, a perfectly business-like arrangement, although so far it is partly business and partly charitable, I think. But what I find is this, that as regards both widows and children, the provision is strictly for those who are in what is called “distressed circumstances.”

I have got before me the original rules of 1800, and in this respect since that time, I think I may say I am satisfied that there has been no substantial alteration. As regards members, which I passed over just now, r. 14 provides that in case a member shall be afflicted “with sickness so as to render him incapable of employment, [that is a mere friendly society] and in distressed circumstances, or shall become infirm or meet with any other infirmity which may, in the opinion of the committee, render him an object deserving the assistance of the society, he shall be entitled,”

and so on. “Distressed circumstances,” although capable of many interpretations, grammatically no doubt, there means not only that a member is so sick that he cannot follow his ordinary employment, but that his position in life is such that he cannot live independently of that employment, that he is distressed in that sense. I do not think there can be any doubt that that is the meaning of the words. Then as regards infirmity, that means some permanent disease, accident or anything of that kind, such as may render him an object deserving of the assistance of the society. Although there is no guide on the face of it—that is to say, no further guide than the words themselves give—it is only reasonable to conclude that the committee would not be doing their duty in considering a man an object deserving the assistance of the society, if, however painful his physical state might be, he had ample means. I understand that that rule points distinctly to poverty. The same is true as regards the widow, who is to be in distressed circumstances, and also as regards the children who are also particularly mentioned as being left in distressed circumstances. So here I have that very element of poverty which HALL, V.-C., I thought was absent in Re Clark's Trust (3), and it has been pointed out that in Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs. v. Pemsell (2) although the decisions have gone far away from poverty as being the strict limit of charity, at the same time poverty is in itself an object of charity; and when you have it expressed in this way linked to the provisions of such a society as this, it is impossible to say that it is a business-like arrangement or mutual insurance society. I conclude that it is a charity, and if I am not, as I think I am not, precluded by authority from holding that, I think I am bound to say that this is a charity.

If it is a charity, then comes the question, is there a lapse? I will assume that if this legacy of £500 is given to a charity, that has ceased to exist at the date of the death—which seems to be the critical point—then the law of lapse applies, at any rate to this extent, that the testator fails to specify the legatee, and therefore, because there is no legatee, which can be specified because there is a non-existent body, as there might be a non-existent person then the money must fall into residue. But it is agreed on all hands that not only at the death of the testator, but up to the present time, there is at least one annuitant claiming against the fund. So that the charity is alive to that extent and must remain alive, as long at least as that annuitant survives. I cannot see how in the world it can be said that this society is dead, though it may still be what counsel for the residuary legatees said it was for a long time—moribund. The difference between moribund and dead is large. Test it in this way: supposing that that annuitant was not paid, she being entitled according to the rules of the society to be paid, could she not assert her rights? If she could assert her rights she could assert them against the fund, and against the administrator of the fund which is in court. It seems to me there is a duty to provide for her annuity which is still existing; and consequently the charitable institution is still existing. It does not follow, because it is still existing, that it has not failed practically. It seems to me, subject to what counsel for the defendants may be able to point out about the other claimants on the fund, that the society has failed except so far as it is necessary to provide for this particular annuitant. That is a matter of consideration as regards the fund in court, with which I am not now dealing. It must be dealt with at another time. As regards this legacy of £500, it is clearly not wanted for the particular annuity; and I ought at once to take care that it is applied, that is to say, put in process of application, to congenial objects; that is to say, objects akin to those to which the testator devoted his legacy, to which it cannot be strictly applied because there are no means of so applying it.

[HIS LORDSHIP then made an order declaring that the society was a charitable society and was existing at the date of the testator's death, and that the legacy of £500 had not lapsed and directed the £500 to be brought into court to a separate account to the credit of the funds of the society after payment of costs with liberty to the Attorney-General to apply for a scheme.]

} Motion on behalf of Edward Miller, who claimed to be executor of the last will and testament of Rebecca Susan Gilbert, of 47, Hawke Street, Portsea, that probate should be decreed of certain parts of a testamentary document dated Mar. 8, 1898.

} The document in question consisted of four pages. The first page was a printed form containing four clauses. One of these gave directions for payment of debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, another bequeathed and devised the business of the Cross Keys, Portsea, to a beneficiary, and a third appointed the applicant executor. A fourth clause contained a residuary bequest, but the name of the beneficiary was left blank. This page was signed by the testatrix and by witnesses. The second page began "I leave my money in Post Savings Bank to the following persons named," and contained a number of pecuniary legacies. The third page was headed "My jewelry to be divided as follows" with the names of beneficiaries. It also contained a bequest of clothes and a bequest for a gravestone. These pages were not signed by the testatrix or witnesses, but the evidence showed that their contents had been written before the signatures of the first page. The fourth page contained certain directions as to debts, but it was admitted that these directions were written on the document subsequently to the subscriptions of the signatures to the first page.

J. C. Priestley for the executor.

^ SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P.—I think I can assent to the argument of counsel for the executor. I am anxious to do so as I think by doing so I should be carrying out the wishes of the deceased. Whether I can do so depends on the words of the Wills Act Amendment Act, 1852, as interpreted in In the Goods of Wotton (1). HANNEN, J., there pointed out how general the words of the Act are. He then says in the course of his judgment (L.R. 3 P. & D. at p. 161),

^ "And then follow words which express what is commonly called the spirit of the Act. 'No signature under this Act shall be operative to give effect to any disposition or direction which is underneath or which follows it; nor shall it give effect to any disposition or direction inserted after the signature shall be made.' Now, of course, if in this case the whole will were to be treated as following the attestation clause, the application must fail. This is the point, therefore, upon which the whole case turns."

I These considerations also arise in this case. Must I hold that the second and third pages of this will follow the signature? In a physical sense they do, but beyond that I do not see that they need be regarded as following it. The second and third pages constitute a sensible will. It may be said that in the present case the initial words of the second and third pages do not constitute such an apt beginning for a will as in the case cited. That is true and there is some difference in that respect between the two cases. At the same time the second and third pages are so clearly intended to be a will that they seem to me implicitly to amount to saying "This is my will." In granting probate of the document as desired, I do not think I shall be carrying the principle of In the Goods of Wotton (1) substantially further.

"to receive your petitioner into his home and to render her conjugal rights, and that your petitioner may have such further relief as may be just."

The respondent, in his answer, filed on Sept. 23, 1895, admitted that he had refused to allow the petitioner to live and cohabit with him, but said that he had good ground for such refusal, as set forth in his answer, which then went on to allege that the petitioner was a woman of most violent temper and scandalous tongue, and that she had habitually slandered the respondent's daughters, whose health had suffered in consequence; that she had endeavoured to provoke the respondent to strike her or to commit some act which would enable her to take proceedings for a judicial separation; that she frequently expressed

A her intention of separating herself from the respondent, and living separate and apart from him; that on Dec. 10, 1894, she voluntarily left his house against his will and without his sanction; that during the six weeks following she paid frequent visits to the house and removed a large quantity of goods, and that she behaved in a violent and abusive manner on those occasions, and once threw a quantity of milk over one of the daughters of the respondent; that in consequence of the petitioner's course of conduct the respondent's health became greatly impaired and he was compelled almost entirely to relinquish his business, and that it would be dangerous to his health if the petitioner were to live with him again; that on or about Mar. 26, 1895, the petitioner and respondent entered into a verbal agreement to live separate and apart, and the petitioner agreed that, as her personal income was sufficient to maintain a separate home, and as she had taken furniture from the respondent's house, she would accept £100 for the purpose of completing the furnishing, and in settlement; and that the sum of £100 was duly paid by the respondent; that the petitioner had never assigned any reason, as between herself and the respondent, why she left him on Dec. 10, 1894, and that until the formal demand made by her solicitors on July 16, 1895, after the arrangement for separation had been made, the question of her return was not raised, either by herself or her solicitors; that the petitioner was possessed of sufficient income to support herself in comfort, and that she had an annual income of £275. The concluding paragraph of the answer was as follows :

E "That by reason of the premises, the petitioner has forfeited any right to the relief she seeks . . . and, further, that she has been guilty of cruelty. . . ."

The respondent prayed that the petition should be dismissed, and that he should be granted a judicial separation on the ground of the petitioner's cruelty. The petitioner, in her reply, denied each and every allegation contained in the answer, and she further pleaded "that the said allegations, even if true, . . . do not constitute a legal answer to the petition. . . ."

May 22, 1896. GORELL BARNES, J., read the following judgment—In this case the petitioner, the wife of Mr. Edwin Oldroyd, of Selborne House, Harrogate, in Yorkshire, engineer, sues for restitution of conjugal rights. The respondent, by his answer admits that he has refused to live and cohabit with the petitioner, but alleges that he has a good and sufficient and lawful ground for such refusal, as set forth in his said answer. The answer then sets forth a number of acts on the part of the wife which, it is contended on the husband's behalf, amount to such conduct as to justify him in refusing to return to cohabitation with the wife. It also alleges that the wife voluntarily, without his permission, and notwithstanding his express objection, left his home on Dec. 10, 1894, and never afterwards returned to cohabitation with him; that in consequence of her conduct his health failed, and it would be dangerous to his health if she were to again live with him; and that a verbal agreement was entered into between them on or about Mar. 26, 1896, whereby they agreed to live apart for the future in consideration of the payment by the husband to the wife of the sum of £100, which was duly paid to her in pursuance of the said agreement. The answer also alleges that the wife has been guilty of cruelty as set forth therein, which means that the acts to which I have referred are alleged to amount to legal cruelty, and the husband prays that he may be judicially separated from the wife by reason of her said cruelty.

It appears that the parties were married on April 9, 1890. The petitioner was a widow with several children, one of whom Marie Amelia Pycock, went with the petitioner to live with her and the respondent after the marriage. The respondent was a widower having three children, two of whom lived in the house after the marriage, the third having married. The petitioner and respondent appear to have known each other for many years before their marriage, and at first lived happily together. The husband's case is that, not very long after the marriage, the wife's conduct became—and continued until they ceased to live together—such as to amount to cruelty towards him, or at any rate, to such conduct as, under the circumstances of the case, justified him, after she left him, in refusing to return to cohabitation with her, together with the defence that she voluntarily left him, and that the verbal agreement alleged in the answer was entered into. The case for the wife was that she had been guilty of no cruelty or conduct such as is alleged by the husband; that she did not voluntarily leave him; and that there was no agreement between them as alleged by the husband.

Dealing first with the question of cruelty, I think it sufficient to say that, although a great deal of evidence was given on the husband's behalf as to what had taken place between himself and the wife, no case of cruelty was established against her. There is no doubt that there had been for some time before December, 1894, a great deal of friction in the lives of these two persons, principally owing to causes to which I will refer later on, and that frequent quarrels had taken place in their household. But I think that the account which was given on the husband's side was coloured by a great deal of exaggeration, which is, perhaps, not unlikely to occur when a person is giving evidence relating to incidents which have taken place when a certain amount of excitement has prevailed, and especially when one party to a quarrel is giving his or her account thereof. I cannot accept this account as representing the real state of the case, and I am of opinion that there is no ground for imputing legal cruelty to the wife; and, although the husband alleged that his health had suffered, I think this was really due to his having unfortunately had an attack of influenza shortly after he and his wife had separated. I may say that possibly his illness may account for the tone of some of the letters written by him in 1895.

His counsel, however, contended that, even if the acts complained of by him did not amount to cruelty, yet that conduct on the part of the wife was established of such a character as to justify the husband in refusing to return to cohabitation, and that the court was entitled, following the decision of Russell v. Russell (1) to refuse to pronounce a decree for restitution of conjugal rights. He urged that the court has power, in accordance with that decision, to refuse a decree for restitution of conjugal rights whenever the result of such a decree would be to compel the court to treat one of the spouses as deserting the other without cause contrary to the real truth of the case, and although no definition of cause appears to have been given in the judgment of LOPES, L.J., in delivering the judgment of himself and LINDLEY, L.J., in that case, he referred to the opinion of LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., in the Scottish case of Mackenzie v. Mackenzie (2), where LORD HERSCHELL expressed himself as follows ([1895] A.C. at pp. 389, 390):

“I am not prepared without further consideration, to assent to the proposition that a spouse who seeks a decree of adherence is in all cases entitled to obtain it unless a case can be established by the defender which will justify a decree of separation. It will be seen that in the view which I take it is not necessary to determine the point in the present case, but I think it right to state the grounds upon which I desire to reserve my judgment upon it. I admit that there is authority for the proposition contended for on behalf of the appellant, but it has never yet, so far as I am aware, been canvassed either in a Court of Appeal or in this House. It seems to me open to question whether the courts ought in all cases to disregard the conduct of the party who invokes their aid in an action for adherence, and to decree it in all cases where a matrimonial offence cannot be established by the defender. It is certain that a spouse may, without having committed an offence which would justify a decree of separation, have so acted as to deserve the reprobation of all right-minded members of the com-

A munity. Take the case of a husband who has heaped insults upon his wife, but has just stopped short at that which the law regards as sævitia or cruelty. Can he, when his own misconduct has led his wife to separate herself from him, come into court, and, avowing his misdeeds, insist that it is bound to grant him a decree of adherence? I cannot better illustrate my meaning than by referring to the case of Paterson v. Russell (3), which was relied on by the
B appellant. It was determined in this House, reversing the decree of the Court of Session, that the wife was not entitled to a separation; could the husband have insisted upon a decree of adherence? Might not the court refuse its aid to one who had so acted, and regard his conduct as a bar to his claim to relief? It is not a notion strange to our law that the court should refuse its aid to one who does not come into it with clean hands, and when the question arises for
C decision I think it may well be considered whether the court would be bound to entertain an action and grant relief at the suit of one whose misconduct, though falling short of a matrimonial offence, has been the primary cause of the difficulty, and has led to the refusal to adhere."

The proposition which counsel for the husband supported was that the court ought not to pronounce a decree for restitution of conjugal rights where the respondent
D has separated himself or herself, as the case may be, from the petitioner with cause, and that cause may be conduct on the part of the petitioner which, though falling short of a matrimonial offence for which a judicial separation could be obtained by the respondent, yet renders it practically impossible, in the opinion of the court, for the petitioner and respondent to live together. Section 16 of the E Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 [see now Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 14: 29 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 338], allows a judicial separation to be obtained on the ground inter alia of desertion by the respondent without cause for two years and upwards. Section 27 [see s. 1 of Act of 1950] allows a wife to obtain a divorce from her husband on the ground (inter alia) of his adultery coupled with desertion without reasonable excuse for two years and upwards. Section 31 [see s. 4 (2) (iii)
F of Act of 1950] provides that the court may refuse to pronounce a decree of divorce where the petitioner has been guilty (inter alia) of having deserted or wilfully separated himself or herself from the other party before the adultery complained of and without reasonable excuse. Section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884 [see s. 14 (i) and s. 15 of Act of 1950] provides that, if the respondent shall fail to comply with a decree of the court for restitution of conjugal rights, such respondent
G shall thereupon be deemed to have been guilty of desertion without reasonable cause, and a suit for judicial separation may be forthwith instituted, and sentence of judicial separation pronounced although the period of two years may not have elapsed since the failure to comply with the decree for restitution of conjugal rights.

In Russell v. Russell (1) the majority of the Court of Appeal held that the Act of 1884 has materially altered the old law as to restitution of conjugal rights, and
H has given the court a power to refuse a decree which it had not before; that the wife's conduct in that case, though not amounting to legal cruelty, would disable her from contending that her husband's desertion was without cause, and she would fail in a suit for judicial separation; and that, as the Act of 1884 made disobedience to a decree for restitution of conjugal rights equivalent to desertion without cause, therefore, by necessary implication the court must have power to refuse a decree for
I restitution wherever the result of such decree would be to compel the court to treat one of the spouses as deserting the other without reasonable cause contrary to the real truth of the case, and they dismissed the wife's petition for restitution and the husband's counterclaim for judicial separation. I understand that this case is under appeal to the House of Lords upon the question of the husband's counterclaim. [For report of Russell v. Russell in the House of Lords see ante p. 1]. The judgment does not define "cause" or "reasonable cause" or "reasonable excuse," which I think all mean the same thing: see LORD PENZANCE in Yeatman v. Yeatman (4), L.R. 1 P. & D. at pp. 491, 494; but, after referring to some cases in which it was held that in a suit for restitution nothing short of a ground for separation afforded a defence to the respondent, the judgment states that if the wife had been petitioning for a judicial separation on the ground of desertion her conduct towards her husband would disable her from contending that the desertion was without cause, and then holds that, as she would fail in a suit for judicial separation, the effect of the Act of 1884 was to empower the court to refuse her a decree in a restitution suit. A

In stating that the petitioner would have failed in a suit for judicial separation, the lords justices, although Yeatman v. Yeatman (4) is not mentioned in the report, seem to have substantially held the same view as that expressed by LORD PENZANCE in that case before the Act of 1884 with regard to suits of judicial separation on the ground of desertion; but they carry the matter further than he did by the effect which they hold that the Act of 1884 has produced upon suits for restitution. He held that conduct falling short of a matrimonial offence sufficient to found a decree for judicial separation was still sufficient "cause" to bar the right of a petitioner to maintain a suit for judicial separation on the ground of desertion. LORD PENZANCE, in the course of his judgment in that case said (L.R. 1 P. & D. at pp. 491, 492): C

"Now it must be borne in mind that, according to the matrimonial law of this country, which the Divorce Acts have not affected to touch on this head, nothing will justify a man in refusing to receive his wife, except the commission of some distinct matrimonial offence, such as adultery or cruelty, upon which the court could found a decree of judicial separation. And that in all other cases, no matter what her conduct, she can always claim a decree enforcing cohabitation. Save, then, in cases where some such a matrimonial offence has been committed, the law does not justify and support the husband in deserting and living apart from his wife. And it may be considered hardly consistent with this to hold that any desertion can be 'reasonable' which cannot be justified by proof of such offence, or, in other words, that the law should at the same time hold the desertion of the husband to have been reasonable, and yet, if asked by the wife, decree that her husband must take her back again. The inconsistency, however, is perhaps more apparent than real. For the legislature may have thought it right, in creating the new matrimonial offence of 'desertion,' to subject the remedy for it to the condition that the conduct of the party complaining should not have led to the result complained of; and if it should have done so, to deny all remedy for the desertion without affirming that the parties were legally justified in living apart. However this may be, the inconsistency, if it exists, is the work of the legislature, as interpreted by the full Court of Divorce. For in the case of Haswell v. Haswell and Sanderson (5) it was decided that conduct falling short of a matrimonial offence sufficient to found a decree for judicial separation was still sufficient 'cause' to bar all remedy to a wife whom her husband had deserted. By this decision I am bound to shape my course." E
H

Later he said (ibid. at p. 494):

"the 'cause' should be grave and weighty which, in the judgment of the court, should deprive a deserted wife of her remedy for that desertion, and her right to set it up as a bar to a divorce for adultery at her husband's suit." I

The Court of Appeal, however, does not hold that the court is to exercise a general discretion in granting or refusing a decree of restitution. To go so far would involve a large alteration of the old law, and would confer a discretionary power on the court of far-reaching effect and most difficult to exercise. Indeed, it was not contended before me that the decision in Russell v. Russell (1) went to this extent. The effect of that case appears to be that, in cases where the conduct of the petitioner has led to desertion by the respondent, and has amounted to sufficient cause to disentitle the petitioner to maintain a suit for judicial separation on the ground of desertion, the court is now empowered to refuse to pronounce a decree compelling the respondent to return to cohabitation with the petitioner. The truth is that in such cases it has become practically impossible for the spouses to live properly together. I may add, there may be some little inconsistency in holding that a decree for restitution may not be pronounced and yet that the other party cannot obtain a decree for judicial separation; but that seems to be the result of Russell v. Russell (1).

I have now to apply these observations to the present case. I am of opinion that, when the whole of the evidence in this case is considered there is nothing in the conduct of the wife which would approximate the case to such cases as are referred to by LORD HERSCHELL, and in Russell v. Russell (1). In my judgment, the wife has not been guilty of conduct which justifies the husband in refusing to return to cohabitation, or which can be said to render it practically impossible for the wife and the husband to live together. [HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence and concluded:] I must pronounce that the wife is entitled to her decree for the restitution of conjugal rights, and that the cross-claim by the husband fails.

Judicial Separation—Jurisdiction—Parties resident within the jurisdiction, but domiciled abroad—Acts of respondent complained of committed abroad—Custody of children.

The court has jurisdiction to entertain a suit for judicial separation if the parties are resident within the jurisdiction at the time of the beginning of the suit, even though the domicile of the parties is foreign or the conduct of the respondent on which the petition is based occurred in foreign countries.

If the court grants a wife a judicial separation under such circumstances, it has also power to give her the custody of the children of the marriage.

Petition by the wife, Fannie Augusta Armytage, for a judicial separation on the ground of the cruelty of her husband, Harry Armytage. The petition also asked for the custody of the two children of the marriage. The acts of cruelty relied on were alleged to have been committed in Australia and in various places in Italy. The husband denied the cruelty. He also filed an act on petition denying the jurisdiction of the court on the ground that he was a domiciled Australian, and that no act of cruelty within the jurisdiction of the English courts was alleged in the petition.

Inderwick, Q.C., and E. Lewis Thomas, for the husband, contended that (i) domicile was necessary to give the court jurisdiction; (ii) even if residence was in some cases sufficient to found the jurisdiction of the court, it was not sufficient unless some act of cruelty was committed within this country; (iii) the court had no power to interfere with the custody of the children of a domiciled foreigner.

A June 21, 1898. GORELL BARNES, J., read the following judgment.—This is a suit for judicial separation by Mrs. Armytage against her husband on the ground of his alleged cruelty towards her. By his answer the husband has denied the alleged cruelty, and by an act on petition he has further pleaded that the court has no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. I have, therefore, to determine a question of fact, whether there has been cruelty by the husband to the wife, and a question of law whether the court has jurisdiction in the circumstances to entertain the suit. The second point raises a question of considerable importance in private international law.

The parties were married at Toorak, near Melbourne, Australia, on April 11, 1888, and there are two children of the marriage, whose custody the wife seeks to obtain. The husband is by birth an Australian, and his domicile is in the colony of Victoria. C He was educated at Cambridge, and has been called to the English Bar. The wife is an Englishwoman born in England, of parents residing at Blackheath, near London. The parties became acquainted on board ship on passage from this country to Melbourne, and their marriage was celebrated shortly afterwards. They cohabited in Australia and in England, and afterwards in Italy, and the occurrences which give rise to this suit took place at Florence in April and May, 1897. The wife D alleges that in April and May, 1897, her husband committed certain acts of violence towards her which caused her to leave him and come to England with her children to seek her father's protection. These acts are denied by the husband, and he alleges that his wife has merely come to this country to endeavour to give this court jurisdiction in this matter. [His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence.] I have come to the conclusion that the wife has established a case of cruelty on the part E of the husband towards her at Florence in April and May, 1897. I further find that she left him in Florence and came to England bona fide in order to shelter herself under the care of her parents, and is now resident in this country. No acts of cruelty in this country were alleged or proved, but the wife stated that she remained in fear of her husband.

F I have now to deal with the question of jurisdiction. The further facts necessary to refer to are these. The wife came to this country with her children on or about May 24, 1897, and she and the children have since resided under her parents' roof and at Bexhill. The husband's solicitor on May 31, 1897, wrote on his behalf to the wife and the father requesting the wife to return with her children to her husband, but she declined to comply with this request. At the end of June, 1897, the husband came to, and has since resided in, England, but I understand he has not taken up G a permanent residence here, and has only come to and is remaining in England for the purpose of enforcing, and so long as may be necessary to determine, such rights as he may have against the wife with regard to the children. In the month of November, 1897, he settled the sum of £100 on each of his children, and made them wards of court in Chancery. He thereupon applied to NORTH, J., for an order for the custody of the children, which was met with a cross-application on the part of I the wife. In the meantime these proceedings were commenced, and the husband was served with the citation and petition in this country. NORTH, J., ordered the application before him to stand over until after the determination of this suit.

The question to be decided, therefore, is whether or not this court can entertain a suit for judicial separation by the wife against the husband in the circumstances I above stated. It may now be taken as settled that this court has no jurisdiction to entertain proceedings for the dissolution of the marriage of parties not domiciled in this country at the commencement of the proceedings. Although in Niboyet v. Niboyet (1) it was held by the majority of the Court of Appeal that residence not amounting to domicile may give the court jurisdiction, that case, which, if followed, would have the effect of giving the court a jurisdiction which it does not concede to foreign tribunals, is opposed to the general current of the cases in this court, and has been practically overruled by the decision of the Privy Council in Le Mesurier

v. Le Mesurier (2). LORD WATSON, in delivering their Lordships' judgment after a review of the authorities, stated ([1895] A.C. at p. 540) that A

"their Lordships have . . . come to the conclusion that, according to international law, the domicile for the time being of the married pair affords the only true test of jurisdiction to dissolve their marriage."

The court does not now pronounce a decree of dissolution where the parties are not domiciled in this country except in favour of a wife deserted by her husband, or whose husband has so conducted himself towards her that she is justified in living apart from him, and who up to the time when she was deserted or began so to be justified was domiciled with her husband in this country, in which case, without necessarily resorting to the American doctrine that in such circumstances a wife may acquire a domicile of her own in the country of the matrimonial home, it is considered that in order to meet the injustice which might be done by compelling a wife to follow her husband from country to country he cannot be allowed to assert for the purposes of the suit that he has ceased to be domiciled in this country. B

The jurisdiction to dissolve marriages was conferred upon this court by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 [see now the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 1], and although that Act does not expressly make domicile a test of jurisdiction, that test is applied by the court to the exercise of jurisdiction in cases of dissolution of marriage. It is derived from the principles of private international law, an adherence to which is necessary, as LORD PENZANCE said in Wilson v. Wilson (3) (L.R. 2 P. & D. at p. 442), to "preclude the scandal which arises when a man and woman are held to be man and wife in one country and strangers in another." D

These principles are expounded by many jurists in this and other countries. They are based on the principle that a person's status ought to depend on the law of his domicile, though there may be limitations and exceptions to this principle: see DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 1896, c. 18, 474 et seq.; cf. SAVIGNY'S s. 362 (GUTHRIE'S translation), 2nd Edn., p. 108. The jurisdiction in suits other than suits for dissolution of marriage is conferred on the court by s. 6 of the Act of 1857. By other sections judicial separation is substituted for the old divorce a mensa et thoro, and a new ground for separation, viz., desertion without cause for two years and upwards, is added [see Act of 1950, ss. 8, 12, 14, 15]. Section 22 provides as follows: E

"In all suits and proceedings other than proceedings to dissolve any marriage, the said court shall proceed, and act, and give relief on principles and rules which, in the opinion of the said court, shall be as nearly as may be conformable to the principles and rules on which the ecclesiastical courts have heretofore acted and given relief, but subject to the provisions herein contained, and to the rules and orders under this Act." [see now the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 32, s. 103 (1)]. G

There are no special provisions of the Act, or rules, or orders, which directly affect the present question. The present suit is for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty. Before the Act it would have been a suit for divorce a mensa et thoro on the same ground, and the inquiry is as to the principles and rules on which the ecclesiastical courts would have acted in the circumstances. The wife maintains that the test of domicile is not applicable as in a suit for dissolution of marriage, and that the ecclesiastical courts would have given her relief where she and her husband are both residing in England in the circumstances proved, whereas the husband maintains that no relief would have been given because the parties are not domiciled in England, and no act of cruelty has been proved within the jurisdiction. H

In support of her contention, the wife's counsel cited the judgments of JAMES and COTTON, L.JJ., in Niboyet v. Niboyet (1) and certain passages from the above-mentioned judgment of LORD WATSON in Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (2). Niboyet v. Niboyet (1) was a case in which a marriage was solemnised at Gibraltar between a Frenchman and an Englishwoman, and the husband resided for several years in I

A England, but, being a consul for France, he retained his domicile of origin. The wife presented a petition for a divorce, alleging adultery committed in England and desertion. The husband appeared under protest, and prayed to be dismissed. It was held (reversing the decision of SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE) by JAMES and COTTON, L.JJ., BRETT, L.J., dissenting, that the court had jurisdiction to grant a divorce. I have already pointed out that this decision is virtually overruled, but LORD
B WATSON, in Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (2), said ([1895] A.C. at p. 531):

C "The main reason assigned for their decision by the learned judges of the majority was that, before the Act of 1857 became law, the petitioner would have been entitled to sue her husband in the Bishops' Court, although he was not domiciled in England, and to ask either for restitution of conjugal rights or for a divorce a mensa et thoro, and in either case for proper alimony; and D consequently that, after the Act of 1857 passed, jurisdiction in divorce might be exercised in the same circumstances. There appears to their Lordships to be an obvious fallacy in that reasoning. It is not doubtful that there may be residence without domicile sufficient to sustain a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, for separation, or for alimony, but it does not follow that such residence must also give jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage. Their Lordships cannot construe s. 27 of the Act of 1857 as giving the English court jurisdiction in all cases where any other matrimonial suit would previously have been entertained in the Bishops' Court."

The reasons given by JAMES, L.J., for holding the wife entitled to sue for a divorce a mensa et thoro in the Bishops' Court fully appear at pp. 4-6 of the report
E (4 P.D.); but his observations appear to me to be limited to the case of the parties being resident though not domiciled in a matrimonial home within the jurisdiction, and a matrimonial offence being committed during such residence either within or outside the jurisdiction. COTTON, L.J., proceeded on very much the same grounds, except that he does not seem to include the case of offences committed outside the jurisdiction. BRETT, L.J., who differed from the other lords justices, was of F opinion that the domicile of the husband in England at the institution of the suit is the fact which gives jurisdiction to the English Divorce Court to decree divorce, and that the same rule applies to suits for judicial separation and to suits for restitution of conjugal rights.

This case cannot, therefore, be considered a distinct authority in the wife's favour, but her counsel, in addition to the last-quoted passage from LORD WATSON's judgment, placed reliance on the following passage from the same judgment of the report
G ([1895] A.C. at pp. 526, 527):

H "No authority can have a material bearing upon that point [viz., whether the courts of a colony have a jurisdiction to dissolve a marriage contracted in England by British subjects who, though resident within the forum, still retain their English domicile] which does not relate to the dissolution of marriage; because there are unquestionably other remedies for matrimonial misconduct short of dissolution which, according to the rules of the jus gentium, may be administered by the courts of the country in which spouses domiciled elsewhere are for the time resident. If, for instance, a husband deserts his wife, although their residence be of a temporary character, these courts may compel
I him to aliment her; and in cases where the residence is of a more permanent character and the husband treats his wife with such a degree of cruelty as to render her continuance in his society intolerable, the weight of opinion among international jurists and the general practice is to the effect that the courts of the residence are warranted in giving the remedy of judicial separation without reference to the domicile of the parties. But the circumstances which justify the courts of the residence in administering remedies for the protection of mutual rights incidental to marriage, which do not involve disruption of the marriage bond, have little or no application to proceedings taken for the purpose of putting an end to the marriage and remanding the spouses to the condition of single persons." A

It is to be observed that the cases referred to in this passage, in which the remedy of judicial separation may be given, are the same as those contemplated by JAMES, L.J., and do not necessarily include the present case, where the parties, though within the jurisdiction at the commencement of the suit, had no joint matrimonial home of any kind in this country. Counsel for the wife did not cite the works of any jurists who may have been referred to by LORD WATSON. The published works of several eminent writers which I have consulted show that doubt has been expressed upon the question which LORD WATSON does not consider doubtful. Most of the writers on private international law and the conflict of laws treat at length the question of the laws and principles upon which the dissolubility or indissolubility of marriage depends, but there is little to be found in the works of such writers on the question of jurisdiction to decree the separation or divorce a mensa et thoro of married persons who are residing but not domiciled in the country of the forum. B C

The reasons are not far to seek. Dissolution of marriage has been permitted in some States and not in others and has been allowed in some States on grounds different from those on which it could be obtained in others. There has been want of unanimity as to the forum which ought to take cognisance of the question of divorce and as to the laws to be applied and the recognition to be accorded in one State to a decree of dissolution of marriage in another. Persons domiciled in a country where divorce has not been permitted or only permitted on certain grounds have in order to obtain divorces temporarily resided or assumed domicile in another country where divorce has been permitted or more easily obtained than in the former country. Hence numerous difficult and varied questions have arisen and been discussed in reported cases and by different jurists upon the question of dissolution of marriage. D E

But in practice suits for judicial separation or divorce a mensa et thoro and restitution of conjugal rights do not appear to have given rise to similar difficulties, and, therefore, cases and discussions as to jurisdiction in these suits are not often met with. Such suits generally occur before the tribunals of the country in which the parties are in fact domiciled, and a case like that before me was not so likely to occur in former days as at the present time, when large numbers of people are to be found residing for more or less lengthy periods away from the place of their domicile. SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE, in his work on INTERNATIONAL LAW (1861), vol. 4, pp. 338, et seq., does not enter upon the question of the validity of a decree of divorce a mensa et thoro by the court of a State in which the parties are living but not domiciled, though he makes mention of Connelly v. Connelly (4), where, in answer to a suit in the Arches Court of Canterbury for restitution of conjugal rights, a wife relied for her answer partly on a decree of separation between the parties at Rome, and, after her plea had been rejected by the Court of Arches, the Privy Council allowed her to amend her plea by stating that she and her husband were domiciled at Rome at the time when the alleged sentence was passed, and that by the law of their American domicile (the lex loci contractus) that sentence would be held valid, but gave no opinion as to what the effect of such further pleading might be. F G H

BURGE, in his COMMENTARIES ON COLONIAL AND FOREIGN LAWS (Edn. 1838), chap. 8, s. 2, pp. 668 et seq., confines his inquiry to the conflict between the law of the one country which treats marriage as indissoluble and that of the other which authorises its dissolution by judicial sentence. He states that the obligatory effect of a sentence of separation a mensa et thoro by a foreign tribunal will be the subject of inquiry by him in a subsequent part of his work when the nature and effect of foreign judgments and sentences are considered, but I cannot find that he reverts to the subject. He observes, however (p. 669), that generally the law of the actual I domicil of the parties is admitted to be competent to decree their separation a mensa et thoro. BISHOP, in his COMMENTARIES ON THE LAW OF MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE (Boston Edn., 1881), s. 158, discusses the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts in England, and shows how the bishop's jurisdiction did not extend beyond his diocese, and concludes with this passage :

"Besides the English courts had no authority to dissolve valid marriages, and it may be doubted whether a suit for separation from bed and board involves a question of status within the principle we are considering. If it does, still no one would seek such a divorce under circumstances to give the decree no personal effect upon the defendant."

DR. BAR considers fully the jurisdiction in divorce in his THEORY AND PRACTICE OF PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW, translated by GILLESPIE, Edn. 1892. At p. 381 he says :

"The result in practice will probably be found to coincide pretty much with the doctrine of the text, because wives claiming aliment or demanding protection will resort to the forum of the place of residence, while these courts will not determine any question of rights so as permanently to affect the marriage relations, unless they have jurisdiction ratione domicilii."

And, again, at p. 384, in the notes :

"The court of the domicil, or even of the place of residence in cases of necessity are competent to lay down provisional rules, e.g., to regulate a provisional separation, to protect the wife from cruelty or to make temporary provision for her aliment, to restore for a time at the husband's instance the domicil conjugal. French practice recognises this."

PROFESSOR WESTLAKE (PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW, Edn. 1890) states that "the jurisdiction of the English court to decree judicial separation depends on the same circumstances as its jurisdiction to grant a divorce" (s. 47), but he adds :

"If the matter be considered on the ground of social rather than legal principle, a doubt may be suggested whether it is necessary to identify the jurisdiction for judicial separation with that for divorce. The former decree leaves the parties man and wife, but gives to the injured party a protection against some of the consequences of that status, and it may, therefore, be reasonable to allow its benefit to be enjoyed within the territory by those who are resident in it, even though the court of their country or domicil should alone be held competent to dissolve the tie of marriage between them."

He further appears to consider that the English court has jurisdiction to decree restitution of conjugal rights where both parties are in England at the time of the action (s. 48). DR. FRASER, in his TREATISE ON HUSBAND AND WIFE ACCORDING TO THE LAW OF SCOTLAND (2nd Edn., 1878), p. 1294, under the title of Actions of Separation and Aliment, points out that different considerations come into play when the object is not permanently to affect the status of parties, but to obtain immediate protection from cruel treatment, or the means of daily subsistence, and the hardship which would arise if the rule were established that jurisdiction in actions of separation only exists in the forum of the husband's domicil.

I do not find that the point in question is expressly dealt with in FOOTE'S PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL JURISPRUDENCE, Edn. 1890; DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, Edn. 1896; EVERSLEY ON DOMESTIC RELATIONS, 1885; STORY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, Edn. 1872; or KENT'S COMMENTARIES, 1873. But in WHARTON'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, Edn. 1881, s. 210, p. 294, there is the following passage :

"Cruelty or other misconduct gives jurisdiction for police purposes to the court of the place where such misconduct takes place and where the offender may be cited though he be not then domiciled; but without such domicil the court, while it will interpose for the protection of the injured party and for a provisional separation, can grant no permanent dissolution of the marriage tie."

And in a note on the same page it is stated that there is much doubt in France whether the courts have jurisdiction to decree a séparation de corps between foreigners not domiciled but resident in France, and that this jurisdiction is maintained in Switzerland.

I conclude from the writers to whom I have referred that most of them are disposed to consider that the courts of the country in which the parties are living, though not domiciled, ought to have the right in a matrimonial suit to afford protection to an injured party from the cruelty of the other party. LORD HANNEN may possibly have had such a case in his mind when, in giving judgment in Firebrace v. Firebrace (5), he said (4 P.D. at p. 67) :

"The domicile of the wife is that of her husband, and her remedy for matrimonial wrongs must be usually sought in the place of that domicile."

But he added :

"It is not, however, inconsistent with this principle that a wife should be allowed in some cases to obtain relief against her husband in the tribunal of the country where she is resident, though not domiciled."

This was a suit for restitution of conjugal rights where the respondent, the husband, who was domiciled in Australia, had left England before the institution of the suit, and it was held that the court had no jurisdiction over him after he left this country, and that the suit could not be maintained. Had he remained in England it would seem from Newton v. Newton (6), and Thornton v. Thornton (7) that the suit could have been maintained. In the recent case of Christian v. Christian (8), the President said that a suit for judicial separation may be founded upon matrimonial residence only as distinguished by our law from domicile.

Having considered sufficiently for the purposes of the case the opinions of the jurists above mentioned, it is necessary that I should revert to s. 22 of the Act of 1857, which requires the court in such a suit as the present to act conformably to the principles and rules on which the ecclesiastical courts had therefore acted and given relief. There are several works which deal more particularly with the jurisdiction and mode of proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts—e.g., BURN'S ECCLESIASTICAL LAW, Edn. 1842; ROGER'S ECCLESIASTICAL LAW, Edn. 1849; SHELFORD'S LAW OF MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, Edn. 1841; and older works, such as GODOLPHIN'S ABRIDGMENT; but I cannot trace in them any statement upon the precise point in question, and the principles to govern it must be deduced from the general principles and practice of the courts. These are stated in general terms so far as concerns the matter under consideration by JAMES, L.J., in his judgment above referred to (Niboyet v. Niboyet (1), 4 P.D. at p. 3), where the jurisdiction of the Court Christian is considered, and it is pointed out that the Church and its jurisdiction had nothing to do with the original nationality or acquired domicile of the parties, that residence as distinct from casual presence on a visit or in itinere was an important element, but that residence had no connection with or little analogy to the question of a person's domicile.

In my opinion, if the parties had a matrimonial home, but were not domiciled within the jurisdiction of an ecclesiastical court, that court would have interfered, if the parties were within the jurisdiction at the commencement of the suit, to protect the injured party against the other party in respect of the adultery or cruelty of the latter, and I can find no authority for the suggestion made by the husband's counsel that such interference could be limited to cases where the offence complained of was committed within the jurisdiction. In Warrender v. Warrender (9) LORD BROUGHAM said (2 Cl. & Fin. at p. 562) : "The law either in this country or Scotland makes no distinction in respect of the place of the commission of the offence." Although the ecclesiastical courts could not extinguish the mutual obligations of husband and wife, they acting pro animae salute, suspended these obligations in order to protect and relieve the injured party. It could make no difference where the parties were residing within the jurisdiction that the necessity for protection and relief arose in consequence of adultery committed by the wrongdoer while temporarily outside the jurisdiction, or of cruelty committed while the parties were temporarily outside the jurisdiction and the apprehension of further acts of cruelty remained. If the parties were within the jurisdiction, and the necessities of the case demanded that one of them should be protected against a matrimonial wrong done by the other of which the courts would take cognisance, I cannot doubt that the courts would have interfered. Manning v. Manning (10), which was relied upon by the husband's counsel, is no authority against that view, because in that case the respondent was not within the jurisdiction of the court, and the petitioner was held not to be a bona fide resident in England. If the husband's contention is correct no decree of judicial separation could be made even in cases like Niboyet v. Niboyet (1), where the parties, though not domiciled, were resident for years in this country.

Then does the present case fall within the principles and rules upon which the courts have acted? I think it does. The wife, an Englishwoman, whose domicile of origin was English, and who has resided at times in England with her husband, is forced by the cruelty committed in Italy of her husband, a domiciled Australian, to seek the protection of her parents in England. Though legally domiciled in Australia, as a matter of fact she has been forced to separate herself from her husband and establish herself in a home of her own in this country. She and her husband are both within the jurisdiction. She has been required to return with her children to her husband, and is afraid to do so owing to her apprehension of the repetition of the acts of cruelty which have been committed against her while they were living together abroad. It is against the repetition of apprehended acts of cruelty that the court grants its protection, and unless the court interferes there is nothing to prevent the husband from forcing himself upon his wife and placing her in a position in which she may be subjected to further acts of cruelty. The status of married persons within the country is recognised. Performance of the duties arising from the marriage tie should be required and protection afforded against an abuse of the position resulting from that tie where necessary. Police protection is an inadequate remedy.

It may be objected that a decree of judicial separation affects the status of the parties, and that a change of status ought only to be effected by the courts of the domicile. But the relief is to be given on principles and rules which, in the opinion of the court, shall be as nearly as may be conformable to the principles and rules on which the ecclesiastical courts gave relief. According to those principles and rules cruelty and adultery were only grounds for a sentence of divorce a mensa et thoro which did not dissolve the marriage, but merely suspended either for a time or without limitation of time some of the obligations of the parties. The sentence commonly separated the parties until they should be reconciled to each other. The relation of marriage still subsisted, and the wife remained a feme covert. A woman divorced by the court a mensa et thoro and living separate and apart from her husband could not be used as a feme sole: see Lewis v. Lee (11). The effect of the sentence was to leave the legal status of the parties unchanged. Although a sentence of judicial separation is to have the effect of a divorce a mensa et thoro under the old law (s. 16 of the Act of 1857), and also the further effect of placing the wife in the position of a feme sole with respect to property which she may acquire or which may come to or devolve upon her from the date of the sentence and while the separation continues, and also for the purposes of contract and wrongs and injuries and suing and being sued during that period: ss. 25 and 26 of the said Act of 1887 [see now Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 1, and Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 21], yet, as the relief to be given now is to be given according to the principles and rules in force in the ecclesiastical courts, I am of opinion that the effect of the said ss. 25 and 26, if they affect a wife's status within the meaning of the term as applied to the principles under consideration, which is doubtful, is not to deprive the court of the power to grant relief in cases where it would have been granted by the ecclesiastical courts.

It may be further objected that as domicile is considered a test of jurisdiction in cases of dissolution of marriage in order that the decree may be recognised in countries other than that of the domicile for the same reason a similar test should be applied in cases of judicial separation. But the reasons which apply in the one case are not applicable to the other; and, even if the principle should be established that the courts of the country of the domicile of the parties are the only courts which can pronounce a decree of judicial separation which ought to be recognised in other countries, in my opinion no valid reason can be urged against the courts of a country in which a husband and wife are actually living pronouncing a decree which will protect the one against the other as long as they remain within the jurisdiction. In the present case the wife's domicile is legally in Australia, but, as a matter of fact, she has justifiably separated herself from her husband and made her home in England, and it is in England that she now requires protection. He has come here and subjected himself to the jurisdiction of the courts of this country. Could anything be more unreasonable than for this court to hold that it has no power to suspend the wife's obligation to live with her husband while in this country and leave her to proceed in the courts in Australia to protect herself against her husband in England? It may, I think, be safely laid down that the ecclesiastical courts would formerly, and this court will now, interfere to protect the wife against the cruelty of her husband, both being within the jurisdiction, when the necessities of the case require such intervention.

I, therefore, hold that this court has jurisdiction to entertain this suit, and I pronounce a decree of judicial separation in favour of the wife with costs. Having held that the court has jurisdiction to entertain the suit, I think it follows that the court has jurisdiction under the powers expressly conferred upon it by s. 35 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and s. 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 [see now Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 26], to make provision for the custody of the children of the marriage. Having heard the case it is probably more convenient that I should dispose of this matter rather than leave it for further contest in the Chancery proceedings. I will hear any application relating to the children in chambers.

Warranty that ship seaworthy at beginning of each stage.*

The implied warranty, which at common law prima facie is to be read into a contract of carriage by sea, that the ship shall be seaworthy for the voyage at the time of sailing, means that she will then be in a fit state as to repairs, equipment, and crew, and in all other respects in a proper condition in ordinary circumstances to proceed to the port of destination. Coal is part of the equipment of a steamship. There is no warranty that the ship shall continue seaworthy during the voyage, but where it is impossible (e.g., for providing cargo space) at the port of departure to take on sufficient coal for the whole voyage, and, for the purpose of coaling, the voyage is divided into stages, there is an implied warranty at the beginning of each stage that the vessel has on board enough coal for that stage.

The plaintiffs' vessel shipped, in the Philippine Islands, a cargo, including a quantity of copra belonging to the defendants, under a charterparty by which the cargo was to be carried to Liverpool for a lump sum freight. So that cargo space could be provided sufficient coal for the whole voyage was not shipped at the loading port, and the voyage, in order that the vessel might be able to take on coal, was divided into three stages—from Cebu (in the Philippines) to Colombo, from Colombo to Suez, and from Suez to Liverpool. Owing to the negligence of the engineer, the vessel left Colombo for Suez, the second stage of her voyage, with an insufficient supply of coal for that stage. In consequence the ship became short of coal and some of the defendants' copra was consumed as fuel. In an action by the shipowners for freight,

Held: the defendants were entitled to set off the value of the copra so consumed against their liability for freight.

Mar. 11, 1899. A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment.—This is an action by the owners of the steamship Vortigern to recover from the defendants the sum of £610 18s. 4d., being for freight under a charterparty dated Aug. 6, 1897, and the defendants defend themselves upon the ground that the cargo, which belonged to them and consisted of copra (a species of coconut), had during the voyage been burnt up by the captain as fuel for the ship, and that this burning up of the cargo had taken place in consequence of the breach of the implied warranty of seaworthiness which attached to the contract of affreightment at the commencement of the voyage—that is, that coal necessary for the due prosecution of the voyage had not been taken on board when the ship commenced the chartered voyage, and the cargo had, therefore, to be used as fuel in the place of coal. F

The defence depends upon a point of law, and a question of fact. The value of the cargo burnt equalled the freight claimed excepting as to £20 which was paid into court by the defendants. The charterparty was in ordinary form, and was for a voyage by the plaintiffs' steamship from Cebu, in the Philippine Islands, to Liverpool, calling at Marseilles, if ordered. By this charterparty the steamship had liberty to call at any port or ports in any order, and by the charterparty dangers of navigation or machinery, negligence, default, or error in judgment of the owners, pilot, master, and crew, or other servants of the shipowner were excepted. The point of law is: What implied warranty of seaworthiness attaches to a contract of affreightment upon a voyage such as the present when from the necessity of the case the ship cannot start upon the chartered voyage with an equipment of coal on board sufficient for the whole voyage if the ship is to be a cargo-carrying vessel, which it clearly was the intention of all parties that it should be. G

It cannot be denied that the implied warranty which prima facie attaches to a charterparty such as the present is that the ship shall be seaworthy for the voyage at the time of sailing, by which is meant that it shall then be in a fit state as to repairs, equipment, and crew, and in all other respects sufficient to take the ship in ordinary circumstances to its port of destination, though there is no warranty that the ship shall continue seaworthy during the voyage. That coals are part of the equipment of a steamship I do not doubt, and if the voyage in this case had been an ordinary voyage, as to which there was no necessity, as regards taking in H coal, for dividing it into stages, it cannot be denied that the steamship was unseaworthy when she started from Cebu on her voyage to Liverpool, for the simple reason that she had not then on board an equipment of coal sufficient to take her in ordinary circumstances to her port of destination. To obviate this difficulty—and a great difficulty it is in cases of long voyages of cargo-carrying steamships (for it is manifest that no cargo-carrying steamship can ever be seaworthy when she starts upon such a voyage as the present by reason of the impossibility of her having on board such an equipment of coal as will be sufficient to take her to the port of destination)—it has become the practice by reason of the necessity of the case for cargo-carrying steamship owners to divide these long voyages into stages for the purpose of replenishing their ships with coal, and thus as far as practicable complying with the warranty of seaworthiness which attached when the ship commenced its voyage.

This practice was resorted to in the present case, for I find by the engineer's log that the voyage was divided into stages, and it appears from the average adjustment that the cargo-owners subsequently acquiesced therein, the first stage being from Cebu to Colombo, in Ceylon, the second from Colombo to Suez, and the third from Suez to Liverpool. At Colombo the ship, accordingly, called and took in coal for the second stage, but the learned judge has found, and there certainly was evidence to support his finding, that the ship did not at Colombo take in a sufficiency of coal for the second stage to Suez, and thus, by reason of the coal falling short while passing up the Red Sea, the defendants' copra was resorted to in order to carry the ship on to Suez, where she again coaled, and so was enabled to perform her chartered voyage to Liverpool. As to the question of fact it was argued on behalf of the plaintiffs that the learned judge was in error in finding that the ship was not fully equipped with coal when it started upon the second stage from Colombo to Suez, and this argument was principally based upon the engineer's log, but that document when looked at has been so much altered that little if any reliance can be placed thereon. In my opinion, GORELL BARNES, J., has dealt with this question of fact in the proper manner by investigating the amount of coal consumed by the ship at different parts of the voyage, and I agree not only in the result he has arrived at but with the reasons he has given which are fully set out in his judgment.

I come to the point of law, which is this: What was the implied warranty, if any (it matters not whether it is called a warranty or an absolute condition), when the ship started upon the second stage from Colombo to Suez? Was there then an implied warranty that she had a sufficiency of coal on board for this second stage—that is, that she was seaworthy for that stage? This is the real point in the case. The shipowners assert that there is no such warranty, and that the sole obligation they were then under to the cargo-owners was that their master and crew should not negligently omit to take in coal at Colombo or during the stages subsequent to the first stage, and that, although the ship might during the second stage in this case have put into Perim and obtained coal, and although it might be negligence for the master and crew not to have done so, as negligence of master and crew is excepted by the charterparty, the shipowners are not liable to the cargo-owners for having burnt up their cargo for fuel as they did. Now reduce this contention of the shipowners into a concrete case to see what in practice it amounts to. Take, for instance, the case of a cargo-carrying steamship, commencing a voyage of some 5,000 miles in length, and the shipowners, for coaling purposes by reason of the necessity of the case, having to divide the voyage into five stages of 1,000 each. The shipowners must admit that they warrant to the cargo-owners that their ship has a sufficiency of coal on board for the whole voyage, when it commenced that voyage, but they assert that by reason of their dividing the voyage into stages, although for their own purposes, this warranty is thus cut down to the first stage of 1,000 miles, and that as regards the residue of the stages (4,000 miles in all) there is no warranty that the ship has a single ton of coal on board, and that the only liability they are under to the cargo-owners during the residue of the voyage is for the negligence, if any, of their master and crew for not taking coal on board when they might have done, and, as negligence of master and crew is excepted by the charterparty, the shipowners are under no liability whatever to the cargo-owners during the transit of the 4,000 miles. A

I am asked to hold that this is the true meaning of the charterparty in the present case. I certainly cannot do so. On the other hand, the contention of the cargo-owners is that, whether the shipowners divide the chartered voyage into stages or not for coaling purposes, that has nothing to do with them, but if from the necessity of the case the shipowners do so, the cargo-owners in no way abandon the undoubted warranty they have at the commencement of the voyage. The only way in which this warranty can be complied with is for the shipowners to extend the existing warranty to the commencement of each stage, and I can see no reason why such a warranty should not be implied, and I have no difficulty in making the implication, for it is the only way the clear intention of the parties can be carried out and the undoubted and admitted warranty complied with. It appears to me to be no answer to say that it is a warranty subsequent to the commencement of the voyage. In my judgment, when a question of seaworthiness arises either between a steamship owner and his underwriter upon a voyage policy or between a steamship owner and a cargo-owner upon a contract of affreightment, and the underwriter or cargo-owner establishes that the ship at the commencement of the voyage was not equipped with a sufficiency of coal for the whole of the contracted voyage, it lies upon the shipowner, in order to displace this defence, which is a good one, to prove that he had divided the voyage into stages for coaling purposes by reason of the necessity of the case, and that at the commencement of each stage the ship had on board a sufficiency of coal for that stage—in other words, was seaworthy for that stage—and if he fails in this he fails in defeating the issue of unseaworthiness which prima facie has been established against him. In each case it is a matter for proof where the necessity of the case requires that each stage should be, and I think that in the present case the necessity for coaling places at Colombo and Suez has been established. B C D E

The question of dividing up voyages into stages, as regards the warranty of seaworthiness, is by no means destitute of authority. There are numerous cases decided upon policies of marine insurance when the voyage is divided into stages, and there is also a case in this court relating to the warranty of seaworthiness upon a contract of affreightment when the voyage was divided into stages. As regards the first class of cases it suffices to cite from a judgment of LORD PENZANCE, when delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, consisting of himself, SIR WILLIAM ERLE, and GIFFARD, L.J., in Quebec Marine Insurance Co. v. Commercial Bank of Canada (1), where the numerous prior authorities relating to voyages consisting of different stages are referred to. LORD PENZANCE says (L.R. 3 P.C. at p. 241): F

“The case of Dixon v. Sadler (2) and the other cases which have been cited leave it beyond doubt that there is seaworthiness for the port, seaworthiness in some cases for the river, and seaworthiness in some cases, as in a case that has been put forward, of a whaling voyage, for some definite, well-recognised, and distinctly separate stage of the voyage. This principle has been sanctioned by various decisions, but it has been equally well decided that a vessel, in cases where these several distinct stages of navigation involve the necessity of a different equipment or state of seaworthiness, must be properly equipped and in all respects seaworthy for each of these stages of the voyage, respectively, at the time she enters upon each stage; otherwise the warranty of seaworthiness has not been complied with. It was argued that the obligation thus cast upon the assured to procure and provide a proper condition of equipment of the vessel to encounter the perils of each stage of the voyage necessarily involves the idea that between one stage of the voyage and another he should be allowed an opportunity to find and provide that further equipment which the subsequent stage J

A of the voyage requires, and no doubt that is so. But the equipment must if the warranty of seaworthiness is to be complied with [namely, the warranty at the time of the commencement of the voyage] be furnished before the vessel enters upon that subsequent stage of the voyage which is supposed to require it."

B Read into this judgment the word "shipowner" in the place of "the assured," and the judgment is in point in the present case. There is no difference between the implied warranty of seaworthiness which attaches at the commencement of the voyage in the case of an assured shipowner and in the case of a shipowner under a contract of affreightment. In each case the shipowner warrants that his ship is seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage. What LORD BLACKBURN said in Steel v. State Line Steamship Co. (3) (3 App. Cas. at p. 86), in the House of Lords, as
C to the warranty of seaworthiness which attaches to "contracts for sea carriage" shows that it is the same warranty as that which attaches when a shipowner insures his ship with an underwriter. The judgment of the Privy Council contemplates, it will be seen, stages of necessity, and I can see no difference in principle between physical stages of necessity and other stages of necessity as to the implication of a warranty attaching thereto.

D But there is also the case in this court in 1892 of Thin v. Richards & Co. (4), which I am unable to distinguish in principle from the present. It was an action by cargo-owners against shipowners for non-delivery of cargo, and the point which arose was whether there had been a breach of the warranty of seaworthiness when the ship commenced its voyage. The ship was chartered for a voyage from Oran, in Algiers, to Garston Dock, Liverpool. There was also an exception as to the negligence of E the master and crew. According to the usual practice, the ship, having left Oran with a light cargo of esparto grass, proceeded to Huelva, in Spain, and there filled up with iron ore, and was subsequently lost on her chartered voyage. It was proved that when the ship left Oran she had not a sufficiency of coal on board to take her to Liverpool, nor did she fill up at Huelva with a sufficiency of coal to take her to F Liverpool. The not taking on board sufficient coal at Huelva arose from the negligence of the engineer. This court (LORD ESHER, M.R., FRY and LOPES, L.J.J.) held that, whether the voyage was to be taken to be a voyage from Oran to Liverpool or a voyage divided into stages, the ship was unseaworthy, for, if the commencement of the voyage be taken as from Oran, she had not then a sufficiency of coal on board for the voyage from Oran to Liverpool, or, if the commencement of the voyage be the stage from Huelva to Liverpool, she then had not sufficient coal on board for
G that stage, and, consequently, whichever the voyage was, the warranty had been broken. The doubt expressed by LORD ESHER whether it was a voyage divided into stages seems to have been, not that a voyage can never be divided into stages if the necessity of the case required it, but whether in such a comparatively short voyage as from Oran to Liverpool the necessity of dividing the voyage into stages had been established by proof.

H In my judgment, GORELL BARNES, J., was correct when he held upon the facts of this case that there was a necessity for dividing the voyage for coaling purposes into stages into which it was divided; that, therefore, the warranty of seaworthiness existed at the commencement of the second stage at Colombo; and that the ship had not then sufficient coal on board for this second stage, and that the defendants were right in their contention. This decides the case in favour of the defendants, and I it is unnecessary to embark upon the point raised as to general average. The judgment of GORELL BARNES, J., must be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs.

HENN COLLINS, L.J.—I think the difficulties which have been suggested in this case are very much diminished when it is realised that the warranty of seaworthiness has always been relative. Though absolute when it attached, its precise extent and limitations were relative, and varied according to the standard which the parties must have been supposed to contemplate as applicable to the adventure. A good instance of this principle is to be found in Burges v. Wickham (5), where the standard of seaworthiness required was determined by reference to the class of the vessel, which to the knowledge of both parties was intended to be insured. That was a case of a vessel built for river navigation sent on an ocean voyage, and the warranty was held to be satisfied by proof that it had been made as fit as was reasonably possible for a vessel of such a description. The cases cited by my brother A. L. SMITH are other instances of the same principle. The custom of a particular trade (e.g., the Greenland whale fishery) or the convenience of the parties to a particular adventure may make it reasonable that the vessel should be equipped up to a different standard at different stages of the voyage, and the warranty of seaworthiness has to be adjusted accordingly. It is a necessary corollary of this principle of varying standards at different stages that at each stage the vessel shall conform to the standard required for that stage. I regard this not so much as a concession to the shipowner as an adjustment of the standard of seaworthiness to the requirements which the conditions of the adventure, according to the understanding and convenience of both parties, demand.

To come to the case before us, it is obvious that the convenience of both parties required that the adventure should be carried out by a steamer, and that it was not reasonably possible for the steamer in question to carry coals enough, in addition to her cargo, to take the vessel to her ultimate destination at a reasonable rate of consumption for a vessel of her class. It is obvious, therefore, that the common purpose could not be reasonably carried out unless the vessel's stock of coal should be from time to time replenished. The warranty of seaworthiness, therefore, must be construed by reference to the reasonably possible standard applicable to such a vessel on such a voyage, and the voyage, for this purpose, must be looked upon as divided into stages, with the necessary incident that the warranty must be adjusted accordingly.

It follows that the warranty must cover a condition that the vessel shall at the commencement of each stage be in this respect seaworthy for that stage. The warranty was, as I have pointed out, in its inception relative; that is to say, varying according to the standard reasonably applicable to the contemplated conditions. Following the process of evolution through which modern commerce has passed, the warranty must be made to conform to modern exigencies—that is, to the rules of convenience which regulate the practice of merchants in respect to particular voyages. To say, as counsel for the plaintiffs contended, that the warranty is limited to the first stage, and is satisfied if the vessel is fit to perform it, is, as it seems to me, to ignore the principles out of which the doctrine of stages was evolved, and to accept it partially only and not in its entirety. The doctrine of stages involves a recurring obligation to bring the vessel up to the required standard at each stage. It cannot be accepted with an illogical limitation. It must be accepted altogether or not at all. Accepting, as I do, GORELL BARNES, J.'s, findings of fact for the reasons given by him and my brother A. L. SMITH, it follows that, whether Colombo to Suez or to Port Said is regarded as the second stage in the contemplated voyage, the warranty of seaworthiness as to coal supply was not made good, to which, of course, negligence (though excepted) is no answer, and, therefore, that the shipowners are liable to make good the value of the copra consumed by reason of the breach of warranty. The question in this case is as to coal only, but the subject-matter as to which the voyage, for the purpose of applying the warranty of seaworthiness, may be deemed to be divided, and what the stages are to be, must be determined in each case by reference to what may be taken as the exigencies of the adventure as contemplated by the parties having regard to the ordinary course of business.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., said that LORD RUSSELL, C.J., asked him to state that he agreed with the judgments which had been delivered.

In the absence of a direction in an appointment by the court of a receiver and manager in a debenture-holders' action that the property of the company should be delivered up to the receiver and manager the company retains possession of its property, the function of the receiver and manager being merely to manage the company's property and to receive its income. Accordingly, if in such circumstances rates due in respect of the company's property remain unpaid the rating authority are entitled to distrain on the property of the company despite the appointment. Moreover, this right to distrain is not to be postponed to the equitable charge on the company's property created by debentures in favour of debenture-holders.

Appeal from an order made by KEKEWICH, J., on a summons in a debenture-holders' action taken out by the rating authority by which they asked that they might be at liberty to distrain on the goods and chattels of the company for unpaid rates.

The company, Marriage, Neave and Co., Ltd., had issued debentures which created a floating charge upon all the property of the company, both present and future, not comprised in or subject to the trusts of, or effectually charged by, the trust deed. The property of the company consisted of a mill, warehouse, and hereditaments, situate in the parish of St. Mary, Battersea, and the company was rated in that parish in respect of that property. On Oct. 26, 1895, rates were made for the half-year ending March, 1896, by the churchwardens and overseers of the parish, in respect of the company's property, amounting to £307 10s. On Feb. 6, 1896, an action was commenced by the first mortgage debenture-holders of the company to enforce their security; and on Feb. 17, 1896, joint receivers and managers were appointed, but the company was not ordered to deliver up possession of its property. The receivers and managers entered on the property for the purpose of performing their duties, but did not reside there. Payment of the sum of £307 10s. was demanded of the company in the usual way, but, the same not having been paid, a summons was, on Feb. 20, 1896, issued against the company to show cause why the amount had not been paid. On the hearing of the summons before police magistrates, on Mar. 2, 1896, a warrant of distress against the company was applied for, which was granted accordingly, but was ordered by the court not to be executed until after Mar. 9, 1896, as it was stated that an application would be made on that date for an order to wind-up the company. As the receivers and managers declined to pay the rates, a summons in the debenture-holders' action was issued on Mar. 10, 1896, asking that they might be at liberty to distrain on the goods and chattels of the company in respect of the rates, notwithstanding the appointment of the receivers and managers.

KEKEWICH, J., dismissed the summons, and the rating authority appealed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The first part of this case turns upon the question whether there has been such a change of occupation as brings into operation s. 16 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869 see now Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 4 (4).

With reference to that, it appears that on Feb. 17, 1896, Paterson and Stevens were appointed by the court receivers and managers in an action instituted by debenture-holders against Marriage, Neave & Co., Ltd. When I look at the order appointing those gentlemen receivers and managers, I do not find—and the omission is very important to my mind—any direction whatever for delivery up of possession of the company's property to them. There is nothing in the order at all about it. And when I come to look at the affidavits, I do not find that the receivers and managers have taken possession of the company's property in any sense that I can see. What they have done is this. They have gone on to the property for the purpose of receiving and managing the income and business of this company. They have not done anything to change the ostensible possession of the property in any way whatever, and upon the facts it appears to me that the possession and occupation have not been changed at all. Counsel for the debenture-holders argued that, inasmuch as corporations could only occupy by their agents, it was quite enough for receivers of a corporation to be appointed to cause it to go out of possession. I do not take that view of the law. A corporation can possess and can occupy in the same way as individuals; and the mere fact that receivers have been appointed by an order like this, which does not order the delivery up of possession, does not cause the company to give up possession. It does not dispossess the company. I do not think, therefore, that there is such a change of occupation made out as is requisite to bring into operation s. 16 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869. That section runs thus :

“If the occupier assessed in the rate when made shall cease to occupy before the rate shall have been wholly discharged . . . the overseers shall enter in the rate-book the name of the person who succeeds or comes into the occupation, as the case may be, and the date when such occupation commences . . .”

The overseers have not done that; nor, in my judgment, it is necessary for them to do it. If you look to see what the real truth is, it appears that the company was and is still in point of law in occupation of the property. The receivers are there as managers of the business. They have no right that I know of to discharge servants contrary to a contract made by the company. It is a mistake to suppose that, because receivers may hire servants, which of course they may do, and dismiss servants, which of course they may do while they break no contract, therefore they oust the company from possession. They are receivers and managers instead of the company, under an order of the court; but the legal possession of the property of the company remains where it was.

That difficulty having been got over, we must look a little further. It is said that, under the statutory provisions, this rate can only be distrained for upon the goods of the person assessed and who has made default. That is the offender. I agree that the offender here was the company. The company is assessed; the company has made default; and the only goods which can be taken under the distress warrant are the goods of the company. Therefore, what we have to ascertain is, are there any goods of the company on these premises which are liable to distress? It is said that there are not. It is said, first of all, that the goods on the premises belong in point of law to the trustees for the debenture-holders. That turns upon the true construction of the trust deed. When you look at the trust deed you find that the goods of the company are expressly excepted—it was suggested on behalf of the debenture-holders, by way of precaution only, and by reference to the Bills of Sale Acts so as to make the exception amount to nothing at all—but the goods are excepted in language which is perfectly unmistakable. The goods, therefore, did not pass, and were never the goods of the trustees for the debenture-holders. So far as that argument goes, therefore, the goods remain in point of law the goods of the company.

The next point is that the debentures are expressed in language so large as to include the goods of the company although the trust deed did not. But, when you look at the debentures and consider what effect they have, it is plain that the only effect is to give the debenture-holders an equitable charge upon the company's goods. That is all they have. They have no right even to take possession of the goods. They have no right to appoint a receiver. All that they could do would be to institute an action to get a receiver appointed by the court. The goods, therefore, are not the property of the debenture-holders in any sense whatever. They are the goods of the company subject only to the equitable charge created by the debentures.

Let us go back and see what the rights of the overseers are. The rights of the overseers under the Poor Relief Act, 1601, and under the distress warrant which they have obtained, are to distrain for these rates upon the goods of the offender. The goods in question are, we find, the goods of the offender, subject to an equitable charge. What is to be done? Counsel for the debenture-holders started a point which was new to all of us, and like every new point it required consideration. It was that, if there was an equitable charge, you could not distrain upon the goods at all. I agree that the power of distraining under the Poor Relief Act, 1601, for poor rates is not like the power of a landlord to distrain. We all knew the difference. A landlord can take any goods, no matter whose, which are brought on the premises, while the overseers' power of distraining is much more restricted. But it certainly astonished all of us to hear it said that the existence of an equitable charge prevented the overseers from recovering rates. It would be a very easy way of escaping from the payment of rates if that were so. When you come to consider the matter you see that it is nothing of the kind. The duty of the overseers is first of all to seize the goods of the company. That they could plainly do. Secondly, to sell the goods of the company. That they could plainly do. Therefore, we get rid of the equitable charge up to that point.

Then the question arises: What is to be done with the money? Is it the business of the bailiff out of the money to pay the owners of the equitable charge in priority to the rates or not. The statute and the distress warrant show that he is not to do that. The substance of the thing is in accordance with the practice, and with what everybody understood, though it seems to have been forgotten, that out of the proceeds of the goods distrained upon the rates should have a priority over equitable charges and everything else. I do not say Queen's taxes, but we are not discussing them. The duty of the bailiff is to pay the rate out of the offender's goods, and to hand the surplus to the owner of the goods. That is his duty, and that does in effect give the rates priority over all other charges with regard to the proceeds of the goods when seized and sold under that distress. There is no action for these rates, and there is sense in that being the legislation on the subject, for when you come to give overseers rights of action questions about priorities at once arise, and you find them provided for. They are provided for under the Bankruptcy Acts, and under the Bills of Sale Acts. A B C

It seems to me, therefore, that the several points taken break down one after the other, and that the appeal must be allowed—that is to say, there must be liberty given to the overseers to distrain upon the goods of the company. Nobody wants them to distrain. The proper form will be to express the opinion that the overseers and churchwardens are entitled to distrain on the goods and chattels of the company in the possession of the receivers and managers at the Albert Mills, and then they will proceed as they think expedient. The debenture-holders must be ordered to pay the costs of this appeal, and also the costs in the court below. D

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first point in this case arises under s. 16 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869. It is said that, the receivers having been appointed, there was a change of occupation. Directly the order is looked at appointing the receivers, it seems to me perfectly clear that that contention cannot be maintained, because we find nothing in that order which directs that possession of the property of the company is to be given up to the receivers. What the receivers have to do is to go on the property and manage the property. The occupation, in my judgment, remained in the company in precisely the same way as it was before. The company continued to occupy. That being so, there was no such change in occupation as is contemplated by s. 16. Something was said about the corporation being occupiers by their servants, and that that was not a case contemplated by this section. The answer is, that corporations are occupiers every day. We have railway companies in every part of England, and they are dealt with as occupiers, and are placed on the rate-book as occupiers. E F G

Then it was said that this occupation of the company was at an end, because the receivers had power to discharge servants, and annul contracts, and do various things that were mentioned. Receivers have no power at all to annul any contract. I mean by that a contract which has to be continued for any definite period. It was the company, and the company only, that could discharge the servants who were in their service under such contracts. It comes to this, that the company continued in occupation for the purpose of s. 16, and the receivers did not occupy the property in such a way as to make them responsible for the poor rate. H

Then the question arises which was dealt with by my learned brother LINDLEY, with regard to what goods can be seized. When the Poor Relief Act, 1601, is looked at, it appears that the goods to be seized, and the only goods to be seized, are the goods of the offender. The offender in this case would be the company. Then it is said that the goods in question which it is sought to seize, were not the goods of the company—that they passed under a certain deed of trust. When the trust deed is looked at it appears that these goods were excepted, and did not pass under the trust deed at all. Therefore, the goods cannot be said to belong to the debenture-holders. The position with regard to the goods is really that they belong to the company subject to an equitable charge in favour of the debenture-holders. There arises the other question with regard to the point as to the equitable charge. It was said that these goods have been made subject to the equitable charge of the I debenture-holders, and that, therefore, no distress could be issued against them, or would be enforceable against them. That certainly took me by surprise. I have seen many cases dealing with the enforcement of the payment of rates such as these, and I never heard of the point being raised before. However, it was necessary to look into it, and when I have looked into it I find that there is a preferential charge in favour of rates—that rates are to be paid in preference to anything like an equitable charge such as this is. What leads me to that conclusion, among other things, is that there is perfect power to distrain, and no action can be brought. I think that this appeal ought to be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In my judgment, Paterson v. Gas Light and Coke Co. (1) has nothing to do with, and in no way affects, the present appeal.

I do not think that I have anything to add to what has been said to show that there is no change of occupation under s. 16 of the Act of 1869. It is only where there is a change of occupation that that section has any operation. To say that because receivers and managers were appointed, ipso facto the persons carrying on business are turned out, is to say that which is not reasonable and not plausible. These receivers, for anything I can see, might have done all their duties without ever seeing this property. They were to carry on the business. They could have appointed a manager of that business under them to take his instructions from them. They never had need to go near the property at all. It is said that the servants of the company became the servants of the receivers. The servants, it is true, became liable to obey their orders, because a competent power had reposed in them the management of the business, but that they are the servants of the receivers, or that the receivers become liable to pay them their salaries, is quite another matter. They may do so; they may re-engage the servants in some way or other. But that they become liable by virtue of their appointment to pay out of their own pockets the salaries, or to fulfil at their own expense any other contracts of the company, is a doctrine that I do not think can be established—at any rate in the way in which it has been advanced before us. The receivers are the managers, that is all. It may very well happen that, as such managers, and for the purpose of management, the court may direct that they should be put into possession of the property of the company, and, if they are so put into possession, it may be that they become the occupiers within the meaning of s. 16. That, however, is not the point that we have to deal with. No such order has been made, and no such idea seems to have occurred to anyone. The occupation of the company has not been interfered with, and, therefore, s. 16 does not apply.

That being so, we are sent back to the Poor Relief Act, 1601, to know what can be done. There quite clearly the powers of distress were prescribed by statute; and, independently of other statutory provisions, the only way is by distress on the goods of the offenders. Marriage, Neave & Co., Ltd., were the persons assessed for the payment of this half-year's rate, and they are the offenders because they did not pay. A question arises as to certain goods which were admittedly on the property; but it is said that those goods were not the goods of Marriage, Neave & Co. So I need not deal with that question. Nor have I anything more to say about the construction of the trust deed, which, to my mind, did not carry the goods and chattels; but there is a charge given by the debentures. Does that prevent the goods from being the goods of Marriage, Neave & Co.? I apprehend not. Putting aside the Bills of Sale Acts, and carrying one's mind to a time not very remote when there was no Bills of Sale Act—before 1854 in fact—can it be said that because a person wrote on a piece of paper: "I charge my household furniture with the payment of £5"—or indeed 5s., for the argument only requires that—"in favour of so and so"—that he is thereby securing himself practically from the payment of rates? The argument put forward comes to this, that the household furniture becomes the property of the person in whose favour the charge is made, and that it cannot be seized by way of distress. I think, however, that the true construction is that they must take the goods of the offenders as they find them, and must distrain and sell and pay the rates first. When they have paid the rates, I do not know but that they may not be called upon in a proper way to account for the surplus to the equitable mortgagees—the persons entitled to the charge. They may or may not; but their first duty is to pay the surplus to the owners; and, if they are not called upon, to no one else. They have first to pay the rates: and that practically gives a preferential charge in favour of the rates.

In Richards v. Kidderminster Overseers (2), decided by NORTH, J., it was held that s. 16 applied—that there had been a change of occupation. We have nothing to do with that case at all. It turned upon a point absolutely different from the present. It was a case in which the terms of a deed had to be considered. It may be that the deed there was similar to that which exists in this case; but the deed in this case has nothing to do with the point now arising. Upon the terms of a deed before NORTH, J., or at any rate upon one particular part of that deed, the company were to remain in possession until a certain event, and upon that event possession was given up. NORTH, J., held—and I see no reason why his decision should not be right—that there was a change of occupation with the necessary result. True it is that in that case there are some words of NORTH, J., which seem to say that the case of a distress under the present statutes falls within the same principle as the case of an execution. I do not know whether or not the matter was argued before him. Apparently not, so far as the case goes. It was not in the least necessary to hold anything of the kind, for, as has been pointed out, there was an actual conveyance of the goods—or an assignment of the goods—to other persons; and that was relied upon. At any rate, if that were treated as a considered judgment with reference to the position of the overseers and their right to distrain under these Acts, we are constrained to say that, in our opinion, it cannot be supported. The result is that the appeal is allowed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lindley, A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.), February 26, March 2, 4, 5, 19, 1897]

Company—Shares—Payment of price by shareholder—Payment in kind—Transfer of property to company—Unimpeachable transaction—Winding-up—Right of liquidator to inquire into value of property transferred.

The liability of a shareholder to pay the company the price of his shares is a statutory liability and is declared by the Companies Acts to be a specialty debt, but that debt can be discharged in more ways than one, e.g., by payment or accord and satisfaction, and, subject to the limited capacity of companies, any mode of discharging a specialty debt is as available to a shareholder as to any other specialty debtor. Provided that a company acts honestly and not colourably and provided that it has not been so imposed upon as to be entitled to be relieved from its bargain, an agreement by the company to pay for property or services in fully paid-up shares is valid and binding on the company and its creditors. Unless the transaction is impeached—e.g., on the ground of fraud—the value of the property or services paid for in shares cannot be inquired into; the value of what is acquired by the company is measured by the price at which the company agrees to buy what it thinks it worth its while to acquire.

W., M., and others, who carried on business as coach proprietors and livery-stable keepers, became desirous of turning their business into a limited company, and a contract was entered into between them as vendors, and the company (in which all the vendors became shareholders), for the sale of the business, plant, etc., for £46,300, of which £20,000 was to be fully paid-up shares of the company. This agreement was duly filed before the issue of any shares. The figure at which coaches, horses, etc., were set down in the books of the company at its formation was about £11,000 less than the sum allocated to this item in the agreement. The company later being ordered to be wound-up compulsorily, the official receiver sought to recover that amount from the vendors on the ground that to this extent the consideration was a sham.

Held: the official receiver, not being able to impeach the agreement, was not entitled to go into the adequacy of the consideration to show that the company had agreed to give an excessive value for what it had purchased.

Mar. 19, 1897. The following judgments were read. I

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., refusing to hold two gentlemen, named Martin and Wragg, liable to pay up certain shares in the company held by them, which are registered in their names as fully paid up. The question is whether these shares are fully paid up or not.

Martin and Wragg were omnibus and coach proprietors, and livery-stable keepers. They were the owners of certain freehold and leasehold property, and of a considerable number of horses, carriages, and a quantity of harness and other things. Their business and the goodwill of it were worth something. They formed a limited company to buy their business and property for £46,300 payable in cash debentures and fully paid-up shares, as will be more fully stated presently. The company was registered on Jan. 9, 1896. Its capital was £20,000 divided into 2,000 shares of £10 each. The objects for which the company was established were stated in the memorandum of association to be to acquire and take over as a going concern the aforementioned business and property, and with a view thereto to enter into and carry into effect (with such modifications as might be agreed upon) the agreement mentioned in art. 3 of the articles of association. The articles of association commenced with a statement to the same effect. Article 3 was to the effect that the directors should forthwith in the name of the company enter into and adopt the agreement referred to which had been already prepared, a copy of which was identified by being indorsed by two of the subscribers to the articles, but with power to make modifications therein. Articles 71-93 relate to the appointment and powers and duties of directors. There were to be not less than two nor more than five. They were to be appointed by the subscribers to the memorandum of association. The directors had power by art. 81 to appoint one or more of their body to be managing director or directors at a remuneration. But nothing turns on these articles. Suffice it to say that to enter into and carry into effect the agreement referred to was not only within their powers, but was one of the first things they had to do.

On Jan. 10, 1894, an agreement was entered into between Wragg and Martin, of the one part, and the company, of the other part, and by that agreement, which was duly registered pursuant to s. 25 of the Companies Act, 1867 [see now Companies Act, 1948, s. 52 (1) (b): 3 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 452], upon Jan. 24, 1894, it was agreed that Wragg and Martin should sell, and the company should purchase of them: (i) the goodwill of their business; (ii) their freeholds; (iii) their leaseholds; (iv) their coaches, omnibuses, and horses; (v) their harness, saddlery, and all other stock; (vi) all contracts relating to the business; and (vii) all other properties the vendors might be entitled to. It was agreed (cl. 2) that the company should pay the vendors for the above-mentioned property and rights the sum of £46,300 in the following way: by £7,000 in cash; as to £9,300, £3,000 in first debentures of the company, and £6,300 in second debentures of the company: as to £10,000 by the transfer to the company of two mortgages, making together £10,000 secured upon the property conveyed; and as to £20,000, the balance of the said £46,300, £19,300 in 1,900 fully paid-up shares of £10 each. By cl. 3 of the agreement the component parts of this £46,300 were allocated to the different matters sold by the vendors to the company thus: to the value of the goodwill, £6,000; to the value of the freeholds, £12,000 (this included the mortgages for £10,000); to the value of the leaseholds, £500; to the value of stock, coaches, horses, plant, etc., £27,300; to contract rights, £250; to all other property, £250—making a total of £46,300. There was a supplemental agreement of the same date relating to the debentures, but nothing turns on this document. The property in the schedule was transferred to the company, and the company paid the vendors £7,000 in cash, and issued to them the debentures and fully paid-up shares as agreed. Martin and Wragg are respectively the registered holders of 891 and 941 of these shares. The company is now in liquidation, and the liquidator contends that these shares were improperly issued as fully paid up, and cannot be properly so treated. No attempt has been made to impeach or set aside the agreement. Nor, having regard to the decision of the House of Lords in Salomon v. Salomon & Co., Ltd. (1), is it possible to hold that agreement invalid on the materials before us. The company, although a small one, promoted by the vendors and managed by them, must be treated as competent to buy the property which it was formed to acquire, and to take it at the price named by the vendors. The only question is whether the shares issued as fully paid up in part payment of the price can be treated as fully paid up.

Before examining the law upon this point, I will state the grounds on which the official receiver contends that they cannot. It appears from the books of the company that the stock-in-trade, which by cl. 3 of the agreement is taken to be worth £27,300, was entered as of the value of £15,375 only, and it is contended that the paid-up shares given to the vendors must be attributed in part at least to this difference of £11,000 odd. In other words, it is contended that the company ought to be treated as having issued shares to the nominal amount of £20,000 (the rest of the £27,300 being cash or debentures) in payment of goods of much less value—viz., of the value of £15,000 odd only—as both vendors and buyers well knew. A

I am quite unable to take this view of the contract. I will assume that the stock-in-trade was worth only £15,000, i.e., that it would not have fetched more in the market. There was no agreement to buy the stock-in-trade at that price, and to pay for it in shares of a larger nominal amount. The third clause in the agreement was merely inserted for stamp purposes. It was absolutely useless and meaningless for any other purpose. No evidence is required to prove it. No lawyer accustomed to the preparation of deeds can fail to see why it was inserted or its legal effect. Stamp duty had to be paid on so much of the £46,300 as was liable to duty, and duty was payable in respect of so much of this sum as was attributable to the goodwill, and of the freeholds and leaseholds, and of nothing else. These were valued at the respective sums mentioned in cl. 3; £27,300 remained, and the stock-in-trade remained, and the £27,300 was attributed to that. I do not say that this was right, but whether right or wrong cl. 3 does not in any way alter the real agreement between the vendors and the company. The real agreement was that the vendors should sell, and that the company should buy, the various properties mentioned in the schedule to the agreement for one sum of £46,300, which apparently was £11,647 more than could have been obtained from any other purchaser. But the parties did not appropriate any part of the purchase money to any definite part of the property purchased, nor is the court at liberty to do so. It would be wholly wrong to treat the agreement as one to pay £27,300 for stock-in-trade, valued as between the vendors and the company at £15,375 odd, and to attribute the whole of the share capital to the purchase of that particular item. To do this is to fasten on the parties a contract which they never made, and one, moreover, which would entirely defeat their intentions if the official receiver is right in his contention. B C D E

Such being the true agreement between the parties, I will endeavour to ascertain the law applicable to the case. In Re British and Foreign Cork Co., Leifchild's Case (2), a limited company bought a patent and paid for it in paid-up shares; the holder was held not to be a contributory. The agreement was not sought to be set aside and no question as to the actual value of the patent was raised. No one apparently thought that question material. This case was decided in 1865 by KINDERSLEY, V.-C., and is valuable as showing that as early as that year it was taken for granted that shares in a limited company issued as paid up in consideration of property transferred to the company must be treated as paid up unless the whole transaction was set aside on the ground of fraud. In 1869 Re China Steamship and Labuan Coal Co., Drummond's Case (3) came before GIFFARD, L.J., sitting as the Court of Appeal, and it was then distinctly decided that even a subscriber of the memorandum of association could satisfy his liability in respect of the shares for which he subscribed by paying for them in money or money's worth, or, as GIFFARD, L.J., put it, "in meal or in malt." This general proposition has never been doubted, but there was a difficulty in applying it to a subscriber of the memorandum of association. The difficulty was to identify the shares which he was to receive as vendor with those which he had bound himself to take and pay for by subscribing the memorandum of association. The difficulty always arises in similar cases. F G H

It has never been doubted, so far as I know, that the obligation of every shareholder in a limited company to pay to the company the nominal amount of his shares could be satisfied by a transaction which amounted to accord and satisfaction or set off as distinguished from payment in cash. In 1867 the legislature rendered all such transactions invalid unless they were made pursuant to a duly registered contract, but if there is such a contract the law is now what it always was. As regards the value of the property which a company can take from a shareholder in satisfaction of his liability to pay the amount of his shares there has been some difference of opinion. But it was ultimately decided by the Court of Appeal I that, unless the agreement pursuant to which shares were to be paid for in property or services could be impeached for fraud, the value of the property or services could not be inquired into. In other words, the value at which the company is content to accept the property must be treated as its value as between itself and the shareholder whose liability is charged by its means.

The following are the decisions which established this doctrine. The point was first raised in 1869 in Re Heyford Co., Pell's Case (4). Pell had agreed to sell his business to a limited company for a certain number of fully paid-up shares which were allotted to him, and were registered in his name. On the winding-up of the company LORD ROMILLY held him to be a contributory in respect of these shares, but to be entitled to an inquiry as to the value of the property given for them, and to be allowed such value but no more towards payment of them. This decision, however, was reversed on appeal by GIFFARD, L.J., on the ground that the agreement for the sale of the business for paid-up shares not being impeached, the shares ought to be treated as paid for in money's worth. In Re Heyford Ironworks Co., Forbes' and Judd's Case (5), LORD HATHERLEY clearly intimated his concurrence with the view that, unless the agreement was impeached, the value of the property given for the shares could not be gone into. In Re Baglan Hall Colliery Co. (6) GIFFARD, L.J., again acted on the same principle, and there being, as he said, "some confusion in the views entertained of cases of this nature," he went fully into the grounds of his decision, referring to the various sections of the Companies Act, 1862, which were material. He fully recognised the obligation of a shareholder to pay for his shares, but he again held that this obligation could be satisfied otherwise than by payment in money. In that case the company had agreed to buy a colliery and to pay for it in shares, and the handing over of the colliery as the consideration for the shares was held to be payment in full. No question was raised as to the value of the colliery.

In Re Empire Assurance Corpn., Lecke's Case (7), STUART, V.-C., criticised Pell's Case (4) and evidently disapproved the decision of GIFFARD, L.J., but, although Lecke's Case (7) was affirmed on appeal, the Vice-Chancellor's strictures on Pell's Case (4) were not approved. In Jones' Case (9) the Court of Appeal again adhered to the principle laid down in Pell's Case (4), Forbes' and Judd's Case (5), and Re Baglan Hall Colliery Co. (6). JAMES, L.J., seems to have had some doubt whether he should have come to the conclusion he did if it had not been for the decisions, but I understand his doubt was as to the identification of the shares subscribed for with those given for the property taken by the company. MELLISH, L.J., had no misgivings, and expressly approved the decision of GIFFARD, L.J., in Pell's Case (4). In Re Matlock Old Bath Hydropathic Co., Maynard's Case (9) fully paid-up shares were allotted to a subscriber of the memorandum of association in payment of property sold by him to the company. He was held to have satisfied his liability, the company "being free to accept payment in any honest way." It was proved to the satisfaction of the court that the shares for which he subscribed were to be paid for in property to be bought by the company at a sum equal to the amount of the shares subscribed for. It was not suggested that the agreement was ultra vires or depended for its validity on the value of the property.

All these cases arose before the Companies Act, 1867, came into operation, although some of them were decided at a later date. In Re Pen' Allt Silver Lead Mining Co., Fothergill's Case (10), which arose after that Act was in force, the above decisions were again considered, and were held inapplicable to cases to which that Act applied unless a proper agreement were duly registered. In Fothergill's Case (10) there was a registered agreement, but it was held not to apply to the shares for which he had subscribed the memorandum of association, and he was held to be a contributory in respect of them. But I can find nothing to throw doubt on the application of the law as settled in Pell's Case (4), and the others referred to hereinbefore to similar cases arising since 1867 in which the shares in question have been issued pursuant to a duly registered agreement as required by the Act.

In Re Wedgwood Coal and Iron Co., Anderson's Case (11), a colliery was sold to a limited company for paid-up shares. A proper agreement was registered. The price of the colliery to the company was £150,000, to be paid in shares. The vendors had shortly before agreed to buy it for £66,000 and to pay £42,000 in shares. They, therefore, made a huge profit. It was nevertheless held by the Court of Appeal that, so long as the agreement for sale to the company was unimpeached, all the 150,000 shares must be treated as fully paid up. This case is the last to which it is necessary to refer, bearing directly on the question I am examining.

I understand the law to be as follows. The liability of a shareholder to pay the company the amount of his shares is a statutory liability and is declared to be a specialty debt: Companies Act, 1862, s. 16 [now Companies Act, 1948, s. 20 (2)], and a short form of action is given for its recovery (s. 70). But specialty debts, like other debts, can be discharged in more ways than one—e.g., by payment, set-off, accord and satisfaction, and release—and, subject to the qualifications introduced by the doctrine of ultra vires, or, in other words, the limited capacity of statutory corporations, any mode of discharging a specialty debt is as available to a shareholder as to any other specialty debtor. It is, however, obviously beyond the power of a limited company to release a shareholder from his obligation without payment in money or money's worth. It cannot give fully paid-up shares for nothing and preclude itself from requiring payment of them in money or money's worth: Re Eddystone Marine Insurance Co. (12); nor can a company deprive itself of its right to future payment in cash by agreeing to accept future payments in some other way. It cannot substitute an action for the breach of a special agreement for its statutory action for nonpayment of calls: see Re Richmond Hill Hotel Co., Pellatt's Case (13). From this it follows that shares in limited companies cannot be issued at a discount [but see now Companies Act, 1948, s. 57, by which such issue is permitted subject to certain conditions]. By our law the payment by a debtor to his creditor of a less sum than is due does not discharge the debt; and this technical doctrine has also been invoked in aid of the law which prevents the shares of a limited company from being issued at a discount. But this technical doctrine, though often sufficient to decide a particular case, will not suffice as a basis for the wider rule or principle that a company cannot effectively release a shareholder from his statutory obligation to pay in money or money's worth the amount of his shares. That shares cannot be issued at a discount was decided in Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper (14), the judgments in which are strongly relied upon by the official receiver in this case.

It has, however, never yet been decided that a limited company cannot buy property or pay for services at any price it thinks proper, and pay for them in fully paid-up shares. Provided a limited company does so honestly, and not colourably, and provided that it has not been so imposed upon as to be entitled to be relieved from its bargain, it appears to be settled by Pell's Case (4), and the others to which I have referred, and of which Anderson's Case (11) is the most striking, that agreements by limited companies to pay for property or services in paid-up shares are valid and binding on the company and their creditors. The legislature in 1867 appears to me to have distinctly recognised such to be the law, but to have required, in order to make such agreements binding, that they shall be registered before the shares are issued. There is certainly no decision yet which is opposed to the above statement of the law. The observations in Re Addlestone Linoleum Co. (15); Re Almada and Tirito Co. (16); Lee v. Ueuchatel Asphalte Co. (17); and Ooregum Gold Mining Co. v. Roper (14), fall far short of deciding that the value of the property or services paid for in shares can be inquired into or is material in any case in which the sale is not impeached.

These and other cases decided upon the Act of 1867 show: (i) that since that Act, as before, shares must be paid for in money or money's worth; (ii) that since that Act, as before they may be paid for in money's worth; (iii) that since the Act payment in money's worth can only be effectually made pursuant to a properly registered contract; (iv) that, even if there is such a contract, shares cannot be issued at a discount; (v) that if a company owes a person £100, the company cannot by paying him £200 in shares of that nominal amount discharge him, even by a registered contract, from his obligations as a shareholder to pay up the other £100 in respect of those shares. That would be issuing shares at a discount [but see note in square brackets supra]. The difference between such a transaction and paying for property or services in shares at a price put upon them by a vendor and agreed to by the company may not always be very apparent in practice. But the two transactions are essentially different, and while the one is ultra vires the other is intra vires. It is not law that persons cannot sell property to a limited company for fully paid-up shares and make a profit by such transaction. We must not allow ourselves to be misled by talking of value. The value paid to the company is measured by the price at which the company agrees to buy what it thinks it worth its while to acquire. While the transaction is impeached this is the only value to be considered. This appears to me to be in complete accordance with the passages quoted from the judgments of COTTON, L.J., in Re Almada and Tirito Co. (16) (38 Ch.D. at p. 423) and LORDS WATSON and MACNAGHTEN in the Ooregum Gold Mining Co.'s Case (14) [1892] A.C. at pp. 136, 137, 147, 148). LORD HERSCHELL's judgment, as I understand it, is distinctly favourable to the respondents.

In my judgment, the law is settled, and cannot be declared wrongly settled by this court at any rate. If it is to be altered, the decisions which have settled it must be declared wrong by the House of Lords, or the law must be altered by Act of Parliament. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., has had to consider this matter on more than one occasion—viz., in Re Theatrical Trust, Ltd., Chapman's Case (8), and again in the present case—and on both occasions the principle on which he based his decision is, in my judgment, correct. The summons which has raised the question of Martin and Wragg's liability is of an unusual kind, being a misfeasance summons and an alternative application to enforce payment up of the shares. It was dismissed with costs, and no question was raised on appeal except the important question of principle which I have considered. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., stated the facts, and continued: So much for the facts, and upon these alone, apart from the cases, I agree with VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., that the official receiver has failed in his case. When I come to the authorities the same result follows. It is now well settled law, that for a shareholder in a company limited by shares to have fully paid-up shares, and, therefore, not to be liable for calls in a winding-up of the company, he must show that he has fully paid up to the face value of the shares either in cash or in value received by the company in some form, or partly in cash and partly in value received by the company in some form, and if the payment other than in cash be relied on, this can only be so if there be a

pursuant to s. 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. The House of Lords has definitely settled this point in Ooregum Gold Mining Co. v. Roper (14). Partial payment is not sufficient, but shares may be lawfully issued as fully paid up for considerations which the company have agreed to accept as representing in money's worth the nominal value of the shares: per LORD WATSON, ([1892] A.C. at p. 136) in the Ooregum Case (14).

It is not suggested that the contract of Jan. 10, 1894, is not an honest bargain, or that its consideration is colourable or illusory. Is a liquidator entitled to go into the adequacy of the consideration, and to show if he can that the consideration for the contract was made inadequate unless it appears so upon the transaction itself, or, if not, if he desires to do so, must he not impeach the contract itself? If there be no consideration at all for the shares, and it be shown, as in Re Eddystone Marine

Insurance Co. (12), that the words inserted in the registered contract "in consideration of services" were placed there as a mere blind, that will suffice. Again, if in a registered contract a money value be placed upon the consideration which the company had agreed to accept as representing in money's worth the nominal value of the share less than the face value of the share, that share would, I should think, not be fully paid up. For instance, as was put in argument, a contract to supply to a limited company 100 tons of coal, valued at 10s. per ton, as a consideration for 100 £1 shares in the company—i.e., a valued £50 worth of coal for 100 £1 shares—these shares would not be, I think, fully paid up. There would be no necessity in such a case for impeaching the agreement for that the shares were not fully paid up in money or money's worth would be apparent upon its face. COTTON, L.J., in Re Almada and Tirito Co. (16) (38 Ch.D. at p. 421), points to such a case as this, though he did not decide it. If, however, the consideration which the company has agreed to accept as representing in money's worth the nominal value of the shares be a consideration not clearly colourable nor illusory, then, in my judgment, the adequacy of the consideration cannot be impeached by a liquidator unless the contract can also be impeached. And I take it to be the law that it is not open to a liquidator, unless he is able to impeach the agreement, to go into the adequacy of the consideration to show that the company have agreed to give an excessive value for what they have purchased.

I will content myself with citing three of the earlier cases which will be found in 5 Ch. App., and I will begin with Pell's Case (4). Pell in this case had agreed to sell to a company the goodwill and stock-in-trade of his business in consideration of 1,500 £20 shares of the company fully paid up. The company was wound-up, and no payment for these shares could be found in the books of the company. LORD ROMILLY, M.R., directed an inquiry as to the value handed over by Pell to the company under his agreement with them, and declared that Pell was entitled to be allowed only the amount of that value. This decision was reversed upon appeal, GIFFARD, L.J., holding that, as the agreement was not impeached, the court had ground for going behind the agreement. In the next year (1870) in Forbes' and Judd's Case (5), HATHERLEY, L.C., deals with Pell's Case (4), and expressly states that, if the consideration is to be impeached, the contract must also be impeached; he says (5 Ch. App. at p. 273):

"The only difference between GIFFARD, L.J., and the Master of the Rolls in that case was this. The Master of the Rolls thought that Pell, being bound to pay the full amount of £20 per share, was not to be taken to have paid it in full unless the property he handed over was worth that amount. That result, however, could only be arrived at by rescinding the contract to buy Pell's business; and GIFFARD, L.J., thought that the contract not being impeached, must be treated as a good contract, and one that ought to be acted upon, so that no question could be raised as to the actual value of the business made over."

The Lord Chancellor clearly approves, and in no way disapproves, of the decision of GIFFARD, L.J., in Pell's Case (4).

In Re Baglan Hall Colliery Co. (6) GIFFARD, L.J., again lays down what he had stated in Pell's Case (4). It is true that in Leeke's Case (7), STUART, V.-C., did not like the decisions in Pell's Case (4) and Forbes' and Judd's Case (5), by LORD HATHERLEY and GIFFARD, L.J. But many cases have been decided since then all in accord with Pell's Case (4), which LINDLEY, L.J., has referred to, and I do not repeat them, and not a single case has been cited to the contrary. It appears to me that in the House of Lords in the Ooregum Case (14) the principle of Pell's Case (4) and Forbes' and Judd's Case (5) was distinctly approved. LORD WATSON says ([1892] A.C. at pp. 136, 137):

"It has been decided that, under the Act of 1862, shares may be lawfully issued as fully paid up, for considerations which the company has agreed to accept as representing in money's worth the nominal value of the shares. I do not think any other decision could have been given in the case of a genuine transaction of that nature where the consideration was the substantial equivalent of full payment of the shares in cash. The possible objection to such an arrangement is, that the company may over-estimate the value of the consideration, and, therefore, receive less than nominal value for its shares. The court would doubtless refuse effect to a colourable transaction, entered into for the purpose or with the obvious result of enabling the company to issue its shares at a discount; but it has been ruled that, so long as the company honestly regards the consideration given as fairly representing the nominal value of the shares in cash, its estimate ought not to be critically examined. That state of the law is certainly calculated to induce companies who are in want of money, and whose shares are unsaleable except at a discount, to pay extravagant prices for goods or work to persons who are willing to take payment in shares. The rule is capable of being abused, and I have little doubt that it has been liberally construed in practice."

LORD HERSCHELL is very distinct upon this point—he says (ibid. at p. 140) :

"But the contrary has been determined. And not only may a share be allotted as fully paid up in respect of property, goods, or services received by the company, but the courts will not inquire into the adequacy of the consideration, and certainly have not required it to be proved that the consideration given was equivalent in cash value to the nominal amount of the shares."

LORD MACNAGHTEN says (ibid. at p. 148) :

"It seems to me that all that has been determined so far is, that the court will decline to rip up a transaction not impeached as dishonest, and not proved to be such, merely because the company may have paid an extravagant price for their property."

In my judgment, whether the facts of this case are looked to, or whether the law applicable thereto is looked at, the liquidator is in the wrong, and that my brother VAUGHAN WILLIAMS's judgment was quite right in dismissing his application.

RIGBY, L.J., stated the facts and continued : As it is not suggested that there is ground for setting aside the contract, I do not see, subject to the point which I reserve as to the appropriation of the purchase money, how, consistently—at any rate with Anderson's Case (11)—the shares could possibly be treated as not fully paid up. In the present, as in Anderson's Case (11), the shares allotted were allotted to vendors, or persons representing vendors, and in Anderson's Case (11) the £150,000 worth of shares allotted consisted, to an extent of far more than 50 per cent. of profit reserved to the members of the syndicate selling. That case is undoubtedly binding upon us. It was cited and relied upon in the Ooregum Case (14), and was not, I think, in any way disapproved of. Certainly there is nothing in the opinions of the noble and learned Lords to shake the authority of the case. By saying that Anderson's Case (11) is an authority binding on us, I do not mean to intimate an opinion that there are not other authorities to the same effect. I think that the series of authorities cited by LINDLEY, L.J., beginning with Pell's Case (4), have made it impossible in such a case as above indicated to inquire effectually into the value of the property taken in exchange for shares where the contract itself is not impeached. If these authorities are to be overruled, that must be done by the House of Lords.

But it is said that a clause in the main agreement of Jan. 10, 1894, viz., cl. 3, makes the present case an exception to the general rule. Before examining that clause I will consider what the actual agreement between the parties was, independently of that clause. Clearly, it was a purchase of the whole freehold property dealt with at an entire price. Neither the vendors nor the purchasers would have sold or bought any one of the items independently of the others. It is not in accordance with the facts that there were a number of independent purchases of separate items, and no one could say that, independently of the clause, it would have been possible to make any appropriation of portions of the purchase money. As the vendors would have the full control over the consideration given, and could divide it in accordance with their rights inter se, there could be no object connected with any difference in those rights in making any appropriation. In addition to this it is manifest that the figures in the clause are not founded on any exact estimate of the rights of the different partners, the figures being throughout round numbers which could hardly by possibility conform to pre-existing rights. It is obvious that it could not in any way make the slightest difference to the company, except for the stamp duty payable, that part of the consideration should be given for one part of the assets rather than for another. My conclusion is, that the clause was intended to be operative only as regards stamp duty. The apportionment may have been a wrong apportionment, but that cannot alter the nature of the contract, or entitle the company to deal exceptionally with it. I am not prepared to say that in no case can the consideration in kind given for paid-up shares be inquired into, even although there may be nothing on the face of the contract to show the insufficiency of the consideration, but I abstain from attempting to define what the cases are. I think it sufficient to say that, in my judgment, the opinions of the noble and learned Lords in the Oregum Case (14) sufficiently indicate that such cases may arise. They must be dealt with when they do arise.

KENNEDY v. DE TRAFFORD AND ANOTHER

HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Herschell, Lord Macnaghten, Lord Morris and Lord Shand), March 18, 19, 1897]

45 W.R. 671]

Mortgage—Sale—Sale of mortgaged property to one of several mortgagors—Mortgage of property by tenants in common—Purchaser a co-tenant—Fiduciary relationship.

Two tenants in common mortgaged a property and one of them collected the rents and managed the property. The power of sale having become exercisable, the mortgagee gave notice that, unless the mortgage were paid off, he would sell at a price equal to principal, interest and costs. He received no objection to a sale on those terms and later sold the property under his power of sale for the stated price to the co-tenant who had collected the rents.

Held: (i) in the circumstances the mortgagee had taken proper precautions in complying with the provisions of his power of sale and had acted in good faith, and the sale could not be set aside; (ii) the sale could not be impeached on the ground of any fiduciary relationship created by co-ownership or by reason of the collection of rents having been left in the hands of the co-tenant who had purchased the property.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, [1896] 1 Ch. 762, affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LINDLEY, KAY, and A. L. SMITH, L.JJ.), [1896] 1 Ch. 762, reversing a decision of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster.

The action was brought by one Kennedy, as trustee in bankruptcy of one Carswell, against one De Trafford, the surviving executrix of Sir Humphrey De Trafford, deceased, and one Dodson, to set aside a sale to Dodson under a power of sale contained in a mortgage deed of certain property in Manchester, which had belonged to Carswell and Dodson as tenants in common, and had been mortgaged by them to Sir Humphrey De Trafford.

The facts of the case appear in the speech of LORD HERSCHELL.

The Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster held that there was evidence that Dodson stood in a fiduciary relation towards the appellant, and that the sale was not a due exercise of the power, and ordered it to be set aside, but his judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeal and the trustee in bankruptcy appealed.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I confess that I think this as hopeless an appeal as has ever been presented to your Lordships. The action is brought against the mortgagees of some property in Manchester, to set aside a sale made by them under the power of sale contained in their mortgage deed. The property mortgaged was held by two persons, the respondent Dodson and a Mr. Carswell, as tenants in common. They were co-owners, each possessing an undivided moiety. The mortgage was for a sum of £60,000 to Sir Humphrey De Trafford who is represented, he being dead, by the respondent De Trafford. It appears that the mortgagees became uneasy about their security, it matters not why, and gave notice calling in the money, and pressing for payment. Payment was not made. Various proposals from time to time were made, none of which came to any effect. At the time to which I am referring, Carswell had transferred his interest by a voluntary settlement to Brown, and he afterwards became bankrupt, and, on the occasion of his bankruptcy, Dr. Kennedy, the appellant, was appointed trustee.

The rents, no doubt, were collected from time to time by Dodson, one of the respondents in this action, and one of the co-owners. I will come in a moment to the circumstances under which they were collected, but I will deal first with the questions raised with regard to the circumstances of the sale. Having, as I have said, called in their money, and payment not having been made, as they desired to reduce the mortgage debt, the mortgagees, then represented by their solicitor, Mr. Taylor, stated that they must be paid the rents of the property as received, instead of their being held by the co-owners for their own benefit, subject to the payment of the interest. Accordingly from a date in the year 1887, the rents were paid over from time to time, by Mr. Dodson who received them, to the mortgagees. But they were not satisfied to let that state of things continue indefinitely; they kept pressing for payment and insisting upon payment. Ultimately they gave notice that they would take proceedings to foreclose. It was suggested that there should be a conveyance of the equity of redemption to save the trouble of foreclosing. Then they gave to Dr. Kennedy, the trustee in the bankruptcy, who represented one moiety, this notice:

"Our clients' instructions are to realise this security if they can obtain principal, interest, and costs. Is Mr. Carswell's trustee (that is, Kennedy) prepared to pay them off? If not, we shall forthwith endeavour to effect a sale by private treaty. We are writing a similar letter to Mr. Dodson."

There was a similar letter written to Mr. Dodson.

The mortgagees, having given that distinct notice that unless the parties came forward and paid off the mortgage they were prepared to sell at a price which would realise principal, interest, and costs, it seems that at a somewhat later period Mr. Dodson entered into negotiations to become himself the purchaser of the property, and ultimately an arrangement was come to in December, 1888, according to which the mortgagees were willing to sell to Dodson for the amount of principal, interest, and costs, and they were willing to leave £54,000 of the money on mortgage after the sale was completed. Mr. Dodson wished for some delay in order to be able to be in a position to carry out that arrangement, and it was agreed that the matter should be completed in the following April. In the month of February, 1889, a communication was made to Dr. Kennedy, or to his solicitor (it matters not which), that the mortgagees were negotiating a sale on the basis of payment of an amount equal to principal, interest, and costs; so that that was known to Dr. Kennedy in February, 1889. In May the transaction was completed by a conveyance. In the autumn of 1891 Dr. Kennedy took his first step in the way of making inquiries as to what the mortgagees had done, with a view to this action which was afterwards brought.

The appellant seeks to set aside the sale, on the ground that the mortgagees have been guilty of a breach of duty in relation to this sale. First of all, it is said that they have sold at an undervalue, and that that sale at an undervalue has arisen from their not discharging the duties incumbent upon them as mortgagees. It is not disputed that they sold in good faith. They did not intend to do anything else but properly exercise the power of sale vested in them under their mortgage. But it is alleged that they did not put up the premises for sale by auction, that they only inserted two advertisements inviting a sale by tender, and that they ultimately sold for the amount of principal, interest, and costs to Mr. Dodson. I am myself disposed to think that, if a mortgagee, in exercising his power of sale, exercises it in good faith, without any intention of dealing unfairly by his mortgagor, it would be very difficult indeed, if not impossible, to establish that he had been guilty of any breach of duty towards the mortgagor. LINDLEY, L.J., in the court below, says that

Well, I think that is all covered really by his exercising the power committed to him in good faith. It is very difficult to define all that would be included in the words “good faith,” or to give an exhaustive definition of them, but I think it would be unreasonable to require the mortgagee to do more than exercise his power of sale in that fashion. Of course, if he wilfully and recklessly deals with the property in such a manner that the interests of the mortgagor are sacrificed, I should say that he had not been exercising his power of sale in good faith.

It is not necessary in this case to give an exhaustive definition of the duties of a mortgagee to a mortgagor, because it appears to me that, if you were to accept the definition of them for which the appellant contends, namely, that the mortgagee is bound to take reasonable precautions in the exercise of his power of sale, as well as to act in good faith, I think in this case he did take reasonable precautions. Of course, all the circumstances of the case must be looked at. To sell in the manner in which the sale here took place might, let us assume for the moment, be under some circumstances improper; what we have to deal with are the existing circumstances. Here there are the two co-owners, who are not acting in all respects harmoniously together. The mortgagee communicates what he is about to do to each of these co-owners. He tells each of them that he is preparing to sell, and that he is willing to take principal, interest, and costs. To that he has received from the present appellant no remonstrance, no answer. Why is he to suppose for a moment that he would receive no answer or remonstrance if Dr. Kennedy thought that selling on such terms would be an improper sale, as being at an undervalue, because it must be certain that more than that sum could be easily obtained? It is obvious that, where such a communication is made, and no answer is received, and no objection put forward, the mortgagee may very reasonably suppose that no objection can be taken, and that nobody considers that he will be selling at an undervalue if he sells for principal, interest, and costs. Having regard to the notice given under those circumstances to Dr. Kennedy, and to the fact that he had heard in February, 1889, that the property was being sold for principal, interest, and costs, and then took no objection to it, it seems to me preposterous for him to come forward at this time of day and allege that he has a right on that ground to insist that the sale is invalid on the ground that the mortgagee has not taken proper precautions in making the sale.

But then it is said that the sale was made to a person who was incapable of buying because he was in a fiduciary relation, and that that fiduciary relation was known to the mortgagees who sold. I do not think it established here at all that there was a fiduciary relation between the defendant Dodson and Kennedy. What are the facts? The mortgagors are co-owners, and no doubt one co-owner, Mr. Dodson, has been left, by Carswell in the first instance, I daresay, to collect the rents. Afterwards an arrangement was come to between him and Mr. Brown, who then represented Carswell's interest, that Dodson should collect the rents and pay the money into a bank, and that each of them should draw on that account for the expenses and for the division of the money which thus belonged to them. But it is a fallacy altogether to say that Dodson only got his right to collect the rents by virtue of that arrangement. Dodson was an owner of this property—the owner of an undivided moiety, it is true, but each owner of an undivided moiety is none the less truly an owner, and Dodson in collecting those rents and profits collected them in the right which he possessed as a co-owner of the property. He did not need agency or the appointment of agent to justify him in collecting those rents. If nothing had ever passed between the two co-owners which constituted an authority from the one to act for the other, his right to collect those rents would not have been one jot or one tittle less than it was. No doubt an arrangement was come to that those rents when collected were to be paid into a bank upon which both the co-owners were to draw, but that was an arrangement that might have been put an end to at any time. It was merely an arrangement which was come to by voluntary agreement between the two co-owners. Each co-owner would have an obligation to account to the other in respect of any rents he collected, or moneys he received under it.

So much for the relation between Dodson and Brown prior to the bankruptcy, or prior to the date of the setting aside of the voluntary agreement; but after that date Dr. Kennedy became a co-owner, and there was no arrangement between Dr. Kennedy and Mr. Dodson at all. What happened was this—that the mortgagees had said to Dodson: "Now you must pay over the rents to us in reduction of our mortgage debt and payment of interest. You must no longer keep them or pay them to your co-owner." They were in a position to insist upon that. Accordingly, they insisting upon that, Dodson did deal in that way with the rents which he collected. That was the state of things during the time that Kennedy was the co-owner. I do not understand it to be suggested that during Kennedy's time Dodson was agent for Kennedy. He not only never received any authority from Kennedy to collect these rents, but he never did collect them for Kennedy otherwise than as paying them over to the mortgagees to whom he was bound to pay them over. At all events it is enough to say that there is not a shadow of ground for suggesting that during that time he was the agent of Kennedy.

But then it is said that during that period he was the agent of the mortgagees, because, they having insisted that he was to collect these rents and pay them over to them, he became their agent in that respect. It seems to me to be clear that he was not their agent to collect these rents. He collected these rents in his own right, the right he had as owner—he was collecting his own rents. No doubt they had insisted that those rents should be paid to them; but how the fact that the mortgagees had said when you have got your rents pay them to us, made Dodson their agent to collect them, I am at a loss to see. Therefore, I take it to be abundantly clear that he was not the agent of the mortgagees in collecting the rents any more than he was the agent of Dr. Kennedy, or than he had been the agent of Brown.

But then it is said, if you look at the evidence of Dodson you will find that he said he was an agent. I confess that I do not think it is of any importance to look at any particular words of that sort used in evidence, especially when the words originated from the counsel and did not originate with the witness. No word is more commonly and constantly abused than the word "agent." A person is spoken of as an "agent," and no doubt in the popular sense of the word he may be said to be an "agent," although, when it is attempted to suggest that he is an "agent" under such circumstances as create the legal obligations attaching to agency, that use of the word is only misleading. Therefore, whatever expressions Dodson may have used calling himself an agent, and however true or applicable they may have been in a popular sense, in point of law and in their legal sense they are meaningless. Dodson was not the agent of Kennedy, and he was not the agent of the mortgagees. If that be so, there is an end of the fiduciary relationship which is supposed to prevent his being a purchaser.

It is said in the present case—and I think that it is the only other point that is urged—that it was concealed by the vendors, the mortgagees, from Kennedy that Dodson was the person who was purchasing, although they informed Kennedy that the purchase was being made, and they informed him of the terms on which it was being made. It seems to me to be utterly unimportant. If there was no fiduciary relation there was no obligation to reveal the name. There was no right in the other party to know it; there was no duty upon them to communicate it. Therefore, it seems to me that all the grounds upon which the right to set aside this sale have been rested utterly and entirely fail.

Another point has been raised—whether it arises upon the pleadings or not seems very doubtful—namely, that, whether the sale is to be set aside or not, Kennedy is entitled to claim, as against Dodson, that, under the circumstances under which Dodson bought, he should be declared trustee of the one moiety for Kennedy. That depends, in the first place, upon the question of the fiduciary relationship between them, arising out of what has been said to be the management of the property and the collection of the rents. I have already—I think sufficiently—dealt with that part of the case. It is quite clear that, in all the transactions for some time prior to this sale, Dodson was not in any sort of way acting for his co-owner—the two were acting each for himself. The communications from the mortgagees were made to both of them, and, so far from Dodson acting as Dr. Kennedy's agent, there was a certain amount of hostility between them—at any rate, there was a want of harmonious action.

But then it is said the mere fact that Kennedy was co-owner with Dodson of this property creates such a relationship between them that the one co-owner could not take this property and hold it for himself, but that the co-owner is entitled, on equitable grounds, to have it declared that the benefit of one part of that purchase should be his. No authority has been cited in support of such a proposition. Cases have been referred to, of a very different description, where the owner of an estate under a settlement—a tenant for life, for example—has been held incapable of obtaining an enlargement of that estate for himself alone. It has been said that, whatever benefit he gets must enure to the benefit of all taking under the settlement. That is a totally different case from this case. The only authority—if it can be so called—which has been cited is the case before Chancellor KENT, but he commences his observations by saying that he is not going to lay down a general rule which would be applicable to such a case as this. He deals with that case—the circumstances of which were peculiar and of immense complication—and he certainly does not lay down any rule or doctrine of law which supports the argument which has been addressed to your Lordships: Van Horne v. Fonda (1). It is not necessary to enter into the details of that case; it is enough to say that, even if it is to be taken as enunciating a rule of law which would be as applicable in this country as in America, it does not enunciate any rule of law which would be sufficient for the appellant in the present case. I think that I have now covered the whole of the ground, and it only remains for me to move your Lordships that this judgment be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. Counsel for the appellant has argued this case with his usual ability and his usual fairness; but I must say that in the whole course of my experience I have never met with so bold and so hopeless an appeal. Certainly I never expected to find a proposition which was thought by a great judge to be so unreasonable and so absurd that of itself it made a complete answer to a case which had some show and appearance of justice, put forward as the foundation and the starting point of a serious argument in this House. I find that in M'Mahon v. Burchell (2), before LORD COTTENHAM, one tenant in common sued another tenant in common who had been in occupation of the property and claimed rent from him. The Lord Chancellor says (2 Ph. at p. 134):

“I must, therefore, take it that the defendant means to raise this proposition: that the fact of the plaintiff having occupied the house, not in entirety but as a tenant in common, makes him liable to his co-tenant. A case has been referred to in which the Vice-Chancellor of England is represented to have so decided, but I cannot think that the Vice-Chancellor can have laid down any such doctrine; for the effect would be that one tenant in common by keeping out of the actual occupation of the premises might convert the other into his bailiff."

And then he goes on to say that there is no foundation for any such doctrine as that. That is exactly the ground on which this case was opened before your Lordships. It was said that Dr. Kennedy took no part in the management of the property, that he left the dealing with the property entirely to Dodson, and that, therefore, Dodson was his bailiff. That was the exact position which Mr. Farwell said in the opening of his case Dodson occupied. There is no foundation for such a proposition that I can find in any of the books or in any of the authorities that have been cited. Nor is there anything in the other ground on which it was attempted to rest this case—the doctrine of principal and agent. In the whole of the evidence I cannot find a single word, or a single scrap of evidence, to show that Dodson ever accepted the position of agent in regard to Dr. Kennedy as his principal. On both these grounds it appears to me that the case entirely fails.

But I must say that I rather think that Dr. Kennedy did himself injustice and did injustice to his clients in saying that he left everything to Dodson, because I find a bill of costs of Dr. Kennedy's solicitors which shows that they exerted themselves as they were bound to do—they exerted themselves very thoroughly for several months, making inquiries here, and making inquiries there, and doing everything that could be expected from persons in their position. That bill begins on May 29, 1888, and goes down to August. They get all the documents, they write to all sorts of people, and they receive several answers, and they have several attendances on them; they write letters to parties requiring particulars of the property and so on. That bill goes down to Aug. 3, and then on Aug. 10, there comes this letter from Taylor and Co. to these gentlemen saying:

"As we have had no communication from you in this matter since your client's moiety was put up to auction, we presume he has abandoned the idea of purchasing, and we shall now deal with the property as we think best in the interests of our clients without any further notice to your client."

That letter does not seem to have been answered, and it appears to me that when they received no answer to that letter the mortgagees were justified in supposing that Dr. Kennedy had done his best to see if he could make any profitable use of this property, whether he could find a purchaser for it, and being satisfied that he could not do so, had abandoned the property, and thereupon they sold the property, as I think they were entitled to do, to Dodson. I think that they did everything that could reasonably be expected of them, but I entirely agree with what has fallen from my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, if a mortgagee selling under a power of sale in his mortgage takes pains to comply with the provisions of that power and acts in good faith, I do not think his conduct in regard to the sale can be impeached. I entirely agree that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LORD MORRIS.—I concur. There is nothing that I can add with advantage.

LORD SHAND.—This case has formed the subject of very full opinions in the Court of Appeal. After what your Lordships have said, I have nothing to add except that I entirely concur in what was said by the judges in the court below, and in what has fallen from your Lordships.

Money—Foreign currency—Rate of exchange—Date of conversion—Action for account—Date when balance found due.

An action for an account in equity is an action for the balance found due on taking the account, and not for the several items to be included in it. Accordingly, where an action was brought in this country by a creditor to have an account taken of money payable to him periodically by the defendant in foreign currency under a contract made abroad, and the court directed an account to be taken,

Held (VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., dissenting), the creditor was not entitled to have the sums so payable converted into English money at the rate of exchange prevailing at the date when each periodical payment became due; the relevant date was that on which the balance due on the account was found.

Appeal from a decision by KEKEWICH, J., in an action brought for an account of what was due from the defendants to the plaintiff as the legal personal representative of one Morison under a contract entered into between him and the defendants.

The contract was dated Oct. 6, 1891. It was in the English language, and was made between Morison, described as a British subject, of the city of Mexico, of the one part, and the defendants, described as of 10, Victoria Street, Westminster, and called the contractors, of the other part, and by it the defendants agreed to pay Morison (i) £595 17s. 6d. in English money on the execution of the agreement; (ii)

one cent. in Mexican currency for every cubic metre of certain excavation works mentioned in the agreement. This one cent. was payable from time to time as and when the same should be received by the defendants from the junta or committee of management of the drainage works of the city and valley of Mexico. The contract provided as follows :

“3. The contractors shall within one month from the date of this agreement, and monthly thereafter, make and furnish to the said A. D. Morison a statement in writing of the total number of cubic metres of excavation which shall have been done by the contractors and paid for by the junta to them as aforesaid up to the date of such account, and of the amount then payable to the said A. D. Morison at the rate of one cent. per cubic metre, and the contractors shall be entitled to take credit for and deduct therefrom all sums paid by them to the said A. D. Morison on account thereof, as per statement attached, and they shall immediately thereafter pay the balance appearing by such account to be due to him. 4. Subsequent payments shall be made by the contractors to the said A. D. Morison as and when the contractors shall from time to time receive from the junta payment for excavation done by them . . .

The £595 17s. 6d. was duly paid, and so long as Morison lived the defendants paid him all that became due to him under the contract. He died in June, 1894, and no one became his legal personal representative until May, 1896, when the plaintiff took out letters of administration to his estate.

In June, 1896, the plaintiff brought this action for an account. It came on for trial on Nov. 4, 1897, and the court then declared that the plaintiff was entitled to have an account taken of what was due and payable to him as Morison's legal personal representative under and by virtue of the agreement, and in taking such an account the defendants were to be credited with a sum of £327, as to which no question arose. The defendants had made no other payments since Morison's death, but had always kept proper accounts of the sums payable to Morison's estate in Mexican dollars. The plaintiff accepted these accounts as correct. On Nov. 15, 1897, the defendants delivered an account showing that on Aug. 31, 1896, a balance of 19,366 dollars was due from them to the plaintiff. On the accounts two questions arose. First, the plaintiff contended that the dollars ought to be turned into English money whenever any dollars ought to have been paid by the defendants, while the defendants contended that the ultimate balance only ought to be turned into English money. Secondly, the plaintiff contended that, even if the defendants were right in their first contention, this balance ought to be turned into English money on Aug. 31, 1896, when the excavating work was finished and paid for by the Spanish government. At that date the rate of exchange for a Mexican dollar stood at 2s. 6d. The defendants, on the other hand, contended that the balance ought to be turned into English money on Nov. 13, 1897, when the amount due was first ascertained and the dollar was worth only 1s. 10½d.

In these circumstances the plaintiff served the defendants with a notice of motion asking that it might be directed that the account should be taken with monthly rests, and that the amount of Mexican dollars found to be due at the foot of each monthly account should be converted into English money sterling as on the date of such monthly account, and at the rate of exchange between Mexican currency and English currency at that date; or, in the alternative, that the amount of Mexican dollars found to be due at the end of each year should be converted into English money sterling as on that date, or that the amount of Mexican dollars found to be due on the date of the grant of letters of administration should be converted as on that day; or that the amount of Mexican dollars found to be due on the date of the judgment should be converted as on that day, or on such date and at such rate of exchange as to the court should seem fit; and further, that the defendants should pay to the plaintiff interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the date of the judgment upon the amount found to be due. The motion was heard by KEKEWICH, J., on Feb. 11, 1898, and was refused with costs. The plaintiff appealed. The notice of appeal asked for a declaration that in taking the account the plaintiff was entitled to have the amount of dollars found due at the end of each month converted into English money at the rate of exchange prevailing at that date; or, in the alternative, that he was entitled to have the dollars found by the account delivered to be due on Aug. 31, 1896, converted as on that day; or, in the alternative, at the rate of exchange on such day as the court thought fit.

Mar. 23, 1898. The following judgments were read.

SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R., stated the facts and continued: Before considering the questions raised by this appeal it is necessary to ascertain the grounds on which any judgment or order for payment in English money can be properly made in a case where the plaintiff sues upon a contract to pay in the currency of a foreign country. The terms of the contract in the present case confer no right to payment in English money. If the defendants had tendered to their creditor either in Mexico or wherever he demanded payment the amounts due from them in Mexican dollars at the proper times they would have offered to perform their obligations in strict accordance with their contract.

The necessity for considering what amount the defendants ought to pay in English money arises simply from the fact that the plaintiff, having the right to sue the defendants in this country for a breach of their contract, has chosen to sue them here instead of in Mexico; and speaking generally the courts of this country have no jurisdiction to order payment of money except in the currency of this country. Whatever sum is ordered to be paid, whether for principal, interest, or damages, must be expressed in English money, or such order cannot be enforced by the ordinary writs of execution. Whether before the Debtors Act an order in Chancery for the payment of so many Mexican dollars could have been made and could have been enforced by attachment I do not pause to inquire. With this possible exception the above statement is correct and affords the true explanation of the necessity for considering how much money in English currency the defendants ought to pay the plaintiff. If the defendants were within the jurisdiction of any other civilised State and were sued there, as they might be, the courts of that State would have to deal with precisely the same problem, and to express in the currency of that State the amount payable by the defendants instead of expressing it in Mexican dollars. If this be the true explanation of the necessity for expressing in English money what the defendants ought to pay, it follows that such necessity does not arise until the court orders payment. But it does not follow that the sum to be inserted in the order is the equivalent at that time of the moneys payable by the terms of the contract, for the defendants may be liable, not only to pay those sums, but also damages in the shape of interest or otherwise for not having paid them at the proper time. The obligations, if any, of the defendants in this respect must be determined before the amount for which they are liable can be calculated and expressed in any order for payment.

The foregoing considerations furnish the principles on which the present case must be decided; and that principle was clearly expressed by LORD ELDON in Cash v. Kennion (1). He said (11 Ves. at p. 316):

"I cannot bring myself to doubt that where a man agrees to pay £100 in London on Jan. 1, he ought to have that sum there upon that day. If he fails in that contract, wherever the creditor sues him, the law of the country ought to give him just as much as he would have had if the contract had been performed."

The application of this principle to various circumstances is illustrated by other decisions (e.g., Cockerell v. Barber (2), Scott v. Bevan (3), Bertram v. Duhamel (4), but it is unnecessary to refer to them at length, and I pass to the facts of the present case.

It must be borne in mind that for two years after Morison's death he had no legal personal representative to whom the defendants could pay anything. During all that time the defendants did not break their contract in not making the payments which they had agreed to make, and, there being no breach of contract, damages for non-payment during that time are out of the question. Moreover, there is no evidence that interest is payable by the law of Mexico on debts in respect of which there is no contract to pay interest, as is the case here. When, in May, 1896, the plaintiff became Morison's administrator he became entitled to demand from the defendants (i) payment at once in Mexican dollars of all arrears due under the contract; and (ii) payment in future, in Mexican dollars and at the stipulated times, of the amounts which should thereafter become due under the contract. Failure by the defendants to make these payments would be breaches by them of their contract, and would expose them to claims for damages in some shape or other.

How these damages would have to be ascertained by an English court if it became necessary to assess them is a question of some difficulty, as will be seen by turning to STORY ON THE CONFLICT OF LAWS, ss. 308 et seq. and SEDGWICK ON DAMAGES (3rd Edn.), p. 250. But, for reasons which I proceed to state, I am of opinion that no claim by the plaintiff to damages in any shape can be supported in the present case. The order of Nov. 4, 1897, was the judgment on the trial of the action, and it limits the right of the plaintiff to an account of what is due to him from the defendants under their agreement with Morison. This judgment excludes all claim to damages for non-payment of particular sums charged against the defendants in taking the account. If the plaintiff wanted to charge the defendants with damages in taking the account he should have obtained some declaration or inquiry entitling him to such damages. Before the Judicature Acts no one ever heard of investigating damages in taking an account in Chancery of money due under a contract. Since the Judicature Acts damages can be given in the Chancery Division where they could not have been given before, but even now a judgment or order for an account of what is due under a contract does not involve an inquiry as to damages in taking the account.

The absence from the judgment of Nov. 4, 1897, of any declaration or inquiry as to damages is easily explained by the long delay in obtaining letters of administration to Morison's estate, during which time no damages could be payable by the defendants; but even as to damages since the plaintiff obtained letters of administration the judgment pronounced is fatal to the plaintiff's first contention, that he is entitled to have all sums payable by the defendants turned into English money at the times when those sums became payable according to the terms of the contract. Such a contention can only be supported on the theory that the defendants are liable for damages for default in payment. To substitute English money for Mexican dollars every time a payment ought to have been made is not to take an account of what is due under the contract, but to give damages for every breach of it which the plaintiff can prove that the defendants committed, which is a totally different matter. Even as regards the balance of 19,600 dollars found due to the plaintiff, I see no grounds for awarding him damages for the non-payment of that sum before it was ascertained. The plaintiff urges that it now appears that this sum ought to have been paid on Aug. 31, 1896; but how could it have been paid then when no one knew what the amount payable was? The sum in question is the balance due on taking the whole account. Under the judgment of Nov. 4, 1897, the defendants are not chargeable with damages for delay in accounting, any more than they are chargeable with damages for not punctually paying sums properly placed to their debit in taking the account. Moreover no undue delay in accounting was proved so far as we know. As soon as the balance was ascertained the defen-

A dants offered to pay it to the plaintiff either in Mexican dollars or in English currency equal to their then value, as the plaintiff might prefer. This offer the plaintiff declined.

B In my opinion, the defendants have been in the right throughout in this particular controversy, having regard, as we must, to the terms of the contract and to the judgment of Nov. 4, 1897, which is not appealed against. The appeal, in my opinion, fails, and ought to be dismissed with costs.

C RIGBY, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The judgment contains no directions as to the way of taking the account, and orders no inquiries for the purpose of fixing the defendants with anything more than the balance which may be found due as the result of taking the account, and under it no claim for damages could arise. It is plain that the parties contemplated the probability of their settling the account out of court, and the defendants promptly rendered, on Nov. 15, 1897, an account showing a balance due to the plaintiff, down to Aug. 31, 1896, of 19,366 dollars Mexican currency. This account did not profess to be a final account, as certain further sums would become payable on commission on the completion of the excavation contract entered into by the defendants, but it included everything down to the date of its being rendered. So far as the balance in Mexican currency is concerned, it has been admitted by the plaintiff to be correct as to figures if only the account is to be taken in the manner in which the defendants had taken it—that is to say, in Mexican currency. The plaintiff, however, contended that it had not been rightly taken, and, down to the bringing of the present appeal, the parties have been at variance as to the way in which the account should be taken.

E The difference arose in this way. The defendants, after taking the account in Mexican currency, turned the balance (admitted to be correct as a mere question of figures) into English money at the rate of exchange of the day—22½d. per dollar, which brought out a sum of £1,795 8s. 11d., from which they deducted £327 6s. 6d., and offered the balance—£1,468 2s. 5d. This the plaintiff refused to receive, claiming to have the account taken on the principle of charging the defendants with the sums payable monthly, estimated in English money at the respective dates on which they became payable. This principle, if allowed, would have necessitated the entire opening of the account from beginning to end, and would, of course, have brought out a balance very different in value from the actual balance of 19,366 dollars shown in the account. After a further unexplained delay of nearly three months the plaintiff, on Feb. 4, 1898, brought this motion. He was not, in my judgment, entitled to a direction to the effect of any one of the alternatives suggested in the notice of motion, though probably the defendants would have had no objection to that alternative which suggested as the time for ascertaining the value of the dollars the date of the judgment, viz., Nov. 4, 1897. In support of the claim for interest at 4 per cent. from the date of the judgment I can see no possible ground.

G The judgment was not a final judgment for an ascertained sum, and it would be altogether without precedent to grant interest in the circumstances. The claim, however, plainly shows, as do the others, that the account rendered on Nov. 15, 1897, was not accepted as a sufficient settlement of accounts.

H As to the first alternative claim, which seems to have been most argued in the court below, as it was on the appeal, it would be sufficient to say that it treats the defendants as having been in default from the death of Mr. Morison, and would be giving the plaintiff the advantage of the delay in taking out administration and in the conduct of the action which would be plainly unjust. In addition to this it proceeds upon an entire misapprehension of the nature of an action for account in equity, which is an action for the balance found due on the taking of the account, and not for the several items to be included in it. The notice of appeal drops all the claims for directions contained in the motion before KIRKEWICH, J., except the first, and substitutes for the abandoned alternatives one for fixing Aug. 31, 1896, as the day for conversion of Mexican dollars. It seems to me that a sufficient answer to that claim is, that the account showing a balance to that date was not delivered A until Nov. 15, 1897, and, even if accepted on that date, could not have formed the basis of an order at an earlier period. But in truth, as before pointed out, it was not accepted in any sense as a satisfactory account until, at the earliest, during the argument of the appeal motion; so that it would be impossible to give a direction on the new alternative. To the present time there has been no settled account.

There is no evidence that the law of Mexico is in any material respect different B from our own, so that, if the suit had been prosecuted there, it would have been impossible to get an order for the payment of the balance before Nov. 15, 1897. This shows that there can properly be no question as to an earlier conversion. Independently of the cases cited as to conversion into English money of foreign C currency, not only was the order of KEKEWICH, J., which is appealed against, quite right, but no order on the substituted alternative could now properly be made, and the only order ought to be that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. I have come to a different conclusion, with great D hesitation, as the question raised is in a sense a question of equity practice. I should have liked on such a question to have deferred to the Master of the Rolls and RIGBY, L.J., but I think it my duty, as a question of principle is also involved, to express my own opinion.

The question, and the only question, argued before us in this case has been what E is the proper mode of taking the account ordered in an action brought in this country by a creditor to have an account taken of money payable abroad by the defendants in foreign currency—whether such account should be taken in the relative values of the English and foreign currencies as of the date of taking the account, or as of F the date when the debts became payable, or as of some other and what date or dates. It was not questioned on either side but that the total debt ordered to be paid after taking the account must be expressed in English currency, and that the amount in English currency must be arrived at by taking the real value in English currency of the foreign currency at the place where payable as a purchasable commodity—that is, in practice, according to the rate of exchange existing at the particular time between the currencies. The only question has been as to what that particular time was.

I will first consider the question irrespective of the form of action. It seems clear G that, in an action in whatever form, in the English courts for the recovery of a debt payable in foreign currency, the amount of the English judgment or order must be expressed in English currency, and that, unless the relative values of the respective currencies are fixed by statute, or some authority binding the English courts, or by H the agreement of the litigants, the amount of the English judgment or order must be based on the quantity of English sterling money which one would have to pay here to obtain in the market the amount of the debt payable in foreign currency, delivered at the appointed place of payment—that is, the amount payable according to the rate of exchange. Scott v. Beran (3) was an authority for this mode of computation. Also this mode of computation is in accordance with the rule applied on the dishonour of a bill of exchange payable in foreign currency in a foreign country: Suse v. Pompe (5). It seems plain that this mode of computing the value of foreign I currency in English sterling money, and thus converting the one currency into the other, is based upon damages for the breach of contract to deliver the commodity bargained for at the appointed time and place; and if this is so, it follows that the date as of which that value must be ascertained is the date of the breach, and not the date of judgment.

If this is the general rule in an action for the recovery in English courts of sums payable abroad in foreign currency, I see no reason why a different rule should be applied in a case where the form of action is, as it is in this case, an action for an account. Suppose the account had been an account of a number of bushels of maize which the defendants had received in Mexico on account of the plaintiff, the amount payable by the defendants to the plaintiff would have to be fixed according to the value of the maize at the date when the defendants ought to have accounted for the maize in question according to the course of business between themselves and their principal, and it seems to me that the Mexican dollar should be accounted for on the same footing. It may be that in the present case it might have been troublesome to ascertain the dates at which the various sums payable as commission in dollars became payable; but this would not, in my judgment, have been a sufficient reason for fixing the amount of the result of the account in English sterling money according to the value of the dollars at the date of the completion of the taking of the account. This difficulty, however, does not arise in the present case, because the plaintiff is willing that the value shall be taken of the dollar as of Aug. 31, 1896, the date down to which the defendants in fact rendered their account, including all the sums now claimed by the plaintiff.

I only wish to add a word or two about some of the cases cited. Cash v. Kennion (1) and Cockerell v. Barber (2) have really but little bearing on the question. In Cash v. Kennion (1) the only question to be decided was who was to bear the cost of remittance to England of a debt paid abroad but payable in England? Was it the creditor or the debtor? The Court decided that the debtor must bear the cost of remittance, which cost was a commission to the agent who collected the money for which the defendant had to account to plaintiff. In Cockerell v. Barber (2), LORD ELDON, in an action brought in England to recover a legacy payable in India of "30,000 sicca rupees" so described in the will, refused to allow the cost of remittance to the plaintiff, but declared that the legacy was to be paid according to the current value of the sicca rupee in Calcutta. LORD ELDON seems to have intended by this the real par of exchange. At all events, 2s. 1d., which was the rate the defendant successfully urged upon LORD ELDON, does not seem to have been the original relative value of the sicca rupee to English sterling, for this, I believe, was 2s. 6d. I think LORD ELDON meant the depreciated value of the rupee in Calcutta; but the main bearing of the case is not on the question of the rate of conversion, but of the date, and as to this LORD ELDON says, in so many words, in Cash v. Kennion (1) (11 Ves. at p. 316):

"Where a man agrees to pay £100 in London upon Jan. 1, he ought to have that sum there upon that day. If he fails in that contract, wherever the creditor sues him, the law of that country ought to give him just so much as he would have had if the contract had been performed."

This puts the conversion on the basis of indemnity against damages for breach of contract, and so does Cockerell v. Barber (2), according to my understanding of the judgment. The same view is taken in SEDGWICK ON DAMAGES (4th Edn.), p. 270.

In STORY ON THE CONFLICT OF LAWS, s. 309, it is said:

"The proper rule would seem to be in all cases to allow that sum in the currency of the country where the suit is brought which should approximate most nearly to the amount to which the party is entitled in the country where the debt is payable, calculated by the real par, and not by the nominal par, of exchange."

By this I understand the learned author to adopt the rule laid down in Scott v. Bevan (3). With regard to this case I would observe that, although the case is a strong authority for treating the value of the foreign currency in English currency as a question of damages—the declaration of the plaintiff and the judgment of the court both so treating it—I am not sure that the allowance of the interest as from the date of the original debt down to the date of the payment into court in the English action is quite consistent with this view; but, be this how it may, there can be no doubt but that the court took as the measure of value £160 Jamaica to £100 English sterling, and, if this is so, I think it follows that the date for the application of the rate should have been the date of the Jamaica judgment, when the obligation sued on arose, and not the date of the English judgment.

I think that the order of KIRKEWICH, J., ought to be amended by declaring that the plaintiff is entitled to have the amount of Mexican dollars found to be due by the account of Aug. 31, 1896, converted into English money sterling at the rate of exchange prevailing between the said currencies on that day. It seems to me that, to hold otherwise, would make the plaintiff's remedy for the recovery of what is due to him differ according to the form of procedure, and according as he brings his action in the Queen's Bench or in the Chancery Division.

Street—Surface—Lowering—Duty of highway authority—Lowering of water pipes already in soil—Prevention of freezing of water—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict., c. 120), s. 98.

A local authority, under powers conferred on them by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, s. 98, proposed to lower the surface of streets in their district, which would result in the thickness of the soil covering water pipes and mains of the plaintiff water company being so reduced that the water in the pipes would be in danger of being frozen in severe weather. Upon motion by the company to restrain the local authority from carrying out their proposed works without also lowering the pipes to the existing depth,

Held: on the true construction of s. 98, the section imposed no duty on the defendants to lower the plaintiffs' pipes, and, therefore, the plaintiffs were not entitled to the injunction claimed.

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., on a motion by the plaintiffs, the Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co., for an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendants, the Wandsworth District Board of Works, their servants and agents, from lowering the surface of the streets and footways in their district whereunder the pipes and mains of the plaintiffs were laid, in any manner which would leave such pipes and mains without a sufficient covering of soil or other material to protect them from injury whether by the passing of traffic, the effect of frost or otherwise, unless the defendants should first alter the position of the pipes and mains by placing them at a depth below a proposed new surface not less than the depth at which the same were below the existing surface. The defendant board in the course of improving footways in their district, proposed to lower the surface of the streets and footways in such a manner that the depth of soil over certain water pipes and mains of the plaintiffs, which was from 1 foot 4 inches to 1 foot 10 inches, would be reduced by from 1 foot 2 inches to 3 inches, in one place leaving only 2 inches of soil above the pipes. It was admitted by the defendant board that the water in the pipes would be in danger of being frozen for part of their length if the proposed lowering of the surface was effected. The defendant board proposed to carry out their works under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, s. 98, which provides :

“It shall be lawful for every vestry and district board from time to time to cause all or any of the streets within their parish or district, or any part thereof respectively, to be paved or repaired when and as often and in such form and manner and with such materials as such vestry or board think fit, and to cause the ground or soil thereof to be raised or lowered, and the course of the channels running in, into, or through the same to be turned or altered, in such manner as they think proper, and to alter the position of any mains or pipes in or under such street, such alteration to be made subject to the approval of the engineer of the company to which such mains or pipes belong.”

KEKEWICH, J., granted the plaintiffs an injunction restraining the defendant board from lowering the surface of the streets and footways in their district in such a manner as to leave pipes of the plaintiffs more exposed to injury from frost or otherwise than they were before such lowering. The defendants appealed.

Aug. 8, 1898. The following judgments were read.

SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R.—Section 98 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, in terms simply confers a power; its language imposes no duty. The words are, “it shall be lawful,” etc. These words may no doubt under certain circumstances impose a duty as well as confer a power, but it is for those who contend that they do both to make good their contention. Nothing can be clearer on this point than the judgment of LORD CAIRNS in Julius v. Bishop of Oxford (2). The defendants have not touched or disturbed the plaintiffs’ pipes. They have in no way injured them, and this circumstance distinguishes the case from Gas Light and Coke Co. v. St. Mary Abbott’s, Kensington, Vestry (3), in which the steam rollers used by the defendants broke the plaintiffs’ gas pipes. The same circumstance—viz., the non-interference with the plaintiffs’ property—distinguishes this case from Geddis v. Bann Reservoir Proprietors (1), where the defendants flooded the plaintiff’s land and said in effect that they could not help it. The answer was that they could help it if they kept a stream into which they poured water free from obstruction by mud, which they could do if they chose. LORD BLACKBURN’S remarks (3 App. Cas. at p. 456), on which the plaintiffs mainly relied, had reference to that state of things, and do not show what the plaintiffs must show—viz., that s. 98 imposes a duty on the defendants to lower the plaintiffs’ pipes, although the plaintiffs do not want to do so for their own purposes.

Underlying the plaintiffs’ contention is the assumption that they are entitled to have a certain amount of soil over their pipes. I can find no warrant for this assumption; and as the defendants are clearly empowered by s. 98 to remove the soil above the pipes, I see no ground for saying that the additional power conferred upon them of lowering the plaintiffs’ pipes imposes the duty of lowering them in order to protect them from injury. The plaintiffs pay nothing for the privilege of laying their pipes down in a public path or road, and they run the risk of having it made higher or lower by the road authorities under their statutory powers. This conclusion is strengthened by s. 61 of the Towns Improvement Act, 1847, which is in pari materia, and empowers the Improvement Commissioners to raise or lower pipes if they deem it necessary so to do. No duty to do so is cast upon them. Section 98 of the Metropolis Management Act, although not quite so clearly worded, has, in my opinion, the same meaning. The appeal motion having by consent been treated as an appeal from a final judgment in the action, the order appealed from must be discharged and judgment be entered for the defendants with costs here and below, and the costs below must be taxed as between solicitor and client, pursuant to the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 1.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is a case of importance, as the decision will affect not only water companies, but gas and other companies who have the statutory privilege of laying pipes under the public streets in the metropolis. For these privileges they make no payment.

The case turns on s. 98 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. The section confers powers on the road authority to pave and repair the streets when and so often as and in such manner as that authority thinks fit, and to raise or lower the ground or soil in such manner as they think proper. This is the principal power, and it is discretionary. Then they have power to alter the position of mains and pipes in or under the street. This is a supplemental or additional power: if it is exercised, the alteration of the position of the mains or pipes is subject to the approval of the engineer of the company to which the mains or pipes belong. In this case the road authority has not altered the position of the pipes, nor have they in any way disturbed or interfered with them. The effect of their works, which have been lawfully executed under their principal power, is to bring the surface of the street nearer to the pipes which remain in situ. The consequence is that the water in the pipes, being but a few inches from the surface, is more exposed to frost. In exercising the power the road authority has not been guilty of any negligence. I am unable to find in the section any express or implied duty cast upon the road authority, when they exercise their power of altering the level of the road, whether by raising or lowering it, to exercise at their own expense their power of altering the position of the pipes for the benefit of the company owning the pipes, much less any duty to place the pipes at a depth below the new surface corresponding with the depth at which they stood below the old surface. I think that no such duty is imposed upon the defendants.

The real question is on whom the expense of altering the position of the pipes is to fall. It appears to me that it falls on the company. They are under no statutory obligation as to the particular depth at which their pipes are to be placed from the surface of the road; it is for them to place them at such a depth as will protect the water from freezing. As between the road authority and the company I think that the road authority is paramount. They are entrusted with the powers over the street, not for their own profit as a statutory body, but for the benefit of the public using the street as a highway. The statutory undertaking of the water company is vested in them with a view to their own profit as a company, and for the purpose of affording a supply of water to the consumers of water within their district. Where the road authority alters the level of the street s. 98 does not afford any means of ascertaining the point at which the supposed duty of the road authority begins in reference to the distance from the surface at which the pipes are to be left, subject only to this qualification—that where the position of the pipes themselves is altered the approval of the company's engineer is required in relation to the position where the pipes are to be relaid. In regard to the authorities cited, I think they are distinguishable as stated by the Master of the Rolls. I agree with HENN COLLINS, L.J. (whose judgment I have had an opportunity of reading), in his statement of the general principles of law derived from the authorities in reference to the exercise of statutory powers.

HENN COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, but I will add a few words on the point, based on the dictum of LORD BLACKBURN in Geddis v. Bann Reservoir Proprietors (1). The point urged is that the plaintiffs have suffered damage by the exercise by the defendants of their statutory powers; that the defendants were armed by the same statute with other powers which, if used, would have mitigated the damage; and that, therefore, they were bound to use them. I think it is quite clear, as pointed out by the Master of the Rolls, that the power to move the pipes is A merely ancillary to the power of levelling the highway, and that there is no statutory duty on the defendants to exercise it unless they require it for the performance of their primary obligation. But it is not on the assertion of such a statutory duty that the arguments for the defendants' liability is or must be based, but on the broader proposition that, being possessed of a power of mitigating damage arising from their proceedings under the statute, they are bound to exercise it. So stated, it is merely B an assertion of the proposition so frequently affirmed, that, where statutory rights infringe upon what but for the statute would be the rights of other persons, they must be exercised reasonably so as to do as little mischief as possible. The public are not compelled to suffer inconvenience which is not reasonably incident to the exercise of statutory powers. The railway sparks cases are instances of this principle: see Vaughan v. Taff Vale Rail. Co. (4); Hammersmith and City Rail. Co. v. C

Brand (5); and Coats v. Clarence Rail. Co. (6).

In the Geddis Case (1), LORD BLACKBURN was dealing with a case in which the rights of adjoining owners had been in fact invaded, the statute under which the defendants acted not enabling them to flood the plaintiff's lands when such flooding might have been avoided by dredging, as the defendants had power to do, the channel by which they sought to pass their compensation water back to the river. D
They were under a duty to pass the water down to the river, and they were given powers to make and maintain channels for this purpose, and when they had not exercised these powers they could not say that the damage to the adjoining proprietors was a necessary incident of the exercise of their statutory right. The statutory power which LORD BLACKBURN thought them bound to exercise was one E without which their duty of passing the water on could not be properly carried out.
Here the levelling of the road could be and was effectively carried out without in any way disturbing the plaintiffs' pipes or infringing any of their rights. I think the dictum of LORD BLACKBURN must be read with reference to the case he was dealing with, and cannot be pressed to cover this one.

But it must be admitted that the defendants are bound to exercise their statutory F power with reasonable regard for the rights of other persons. I think, when it is once clear that the main purpose of the defendants could be completely carried out without recourse to the power of moving the pipes, the obligation of the statutory body must be tried by the same standard of duty as is applicable to private persons.
Of course, being merely a creature of statute, they cannot exercise powers if the statute has not conferred them, but it does not follow that they are bound to use G them because they possess them any more than a private person would be. They merely fall under the general principle sic utere tuo ut alienam non lædas. Here the plaintiffs have no right to any particular thickness of soil above their pipes; they are subordinate in this respect to the duties of the road authority: see Gas Light and Coke Co. v. St. Mary Abbott's, Kensington, Vestry (3). But they are not trespassers.
Their pipes are lawfully in the road, and the defendants' acts have undoubtedly H damaged, if they have not injured, them. I think they can have no higher claim to consideration at the hands of the defendants than the owner of a house for which no right of support from the adjoining house had been acquired would be entitled to claim against the adjoining owner who in pulling his house down withdraws support to which his neighbour is not entitled. I think it is clear in such case that, though the pulling-down owner must be careful to interfere as little as possible with the I adjoining house, he is certainly not called upon to take active steps for its protection, as, for instance, by shoring it up.

There is a broad distinction between exercising a right with reasonable care so as not to do avoidable damage and taking active measures to ensure the continuance of something that is not a right in the adjoining owner. Chadwick v. Trower (7), which goes, perhaps, further than any other case in the plaintiffs' favour, merely decides that, supposing there is a duty upon a person pulling down his own house to take care not to injure his neighbour's vault in so doing, where he knows of its existence, though it has acquired no right to support, there can be no such duty where he does not know of it. And it cannot be the law that the pulling-down owner is bound to find a substitute or equivalent for the support which he has a right to remove. That he has such a right is clear: see Dalton v. Angus (8). I think the result is that, though the person pulling down is bound to do no unnecessary damage, he is not fixed with any obligation to take active steps to mitigate a mischief which follows inevitably upon the reasonable exercise of his own rights. I think, therefore, the only obligation on the defendants was to use reasonable care to do no unnecessary damage to the plaintiffs, and I think the existence of the power to move the pipes, and the fact that it was unused, would afford no evidence of want of such reasonable care, and that, therefore, the judgment ought to be for the defendants.

Specific Performance—Sale of land—Offer to purchase made to vendor's agent—Acceptance by agent on behalf of principal—Vendor named in acceptance, but not in offer—Sufficiency of memorandum in writing—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), s. 4.

A leasehold house was put up for sale by auction by J. & Co., a firm of auctioneers, but was not sold. On the same day the defendant wrote to J. & Co. as follows: "I hereby offer the sum of £350 for . . . and if my offer is accepted I will pay deposit and sign contract on the auction particulars." J. & Co. replied as follows: "On behalf of our client, Mrs. M. A. F. [the plaintiff], we beg to accept your offer for . . . subject to contract as agreed." J. & Co. inclosed for signature by the defendant a draft contract which was substantially the same as that indorsed on the auction particulars, but the defendant never signed this contract and subsequently he refused to complete.

In an action for specific performance brought by the plaintiff the defendant contended, inter alia, that there was insufficient memorandum to satisfy s. 4 of the Statute of Frauds as there was no memorandum or note of the contract signed by him as the party to be charged, and that the acceptance of his offer by J. & Co. was only conditional by virtue of the words "subject to contract as agreed."

Held: (i) the offer signed by the defendant contained the names of the actual contracting parties, it being immaterial that one of those parties was acting as agent for an undisclosed principal, and, therefore, the provisions of the Statute of Frauds were satisfied; (ii) as the form of the contract was in writing, definitive in all its terms and clearly identified by the offer, the contract was complete on acceptance of that offer whether the draft contract was signed or not, and so the contract was absolute and not conditional; accordingly the plaintiff was entitled to an order for specific performance.

Notes. Section 4 of the Statute of Frauds (which imposed the need of a written memorandum before certain contracts could be enforced) has been largely repealed, but it still applies to a guarantee, and under s. 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925 (20 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 500), no action may be brought on a contract for the sale of land, etc., unless the agreement or memorandum thereof is in writing.

Action for the specific performance of an agreement to buy a leasehold house.

The plaintiff, Mrs. M. A. Filby, on Sept. 24, 1895, caused a leasehold house belonging to her to be put up for auction by Messrs. Frank Jolly & Co., a firm of auctioneers. A memorandum was indorsed on the printed conditions of sale whereby the purchaser acknowledged that he had paid

“to Messrs. Frank Jolly & Co., the auctioneers, the sum of £ , as a deposit and in part payment of the said purchase money,” and agreed “to pay the balance of the purchase money and to complete the purchase according to the within conditions of sale.” The property was not sold at the auction, but on the same day the defendant wrote to Messrs. Jolly & Co. the following letter:

"September 24, 1895.—To Frank Jolly & Co.—I hereby offer the sum of three hundred and fifty pounds (£350) for No. 1, Kenmure Road, Hackney, lease about eighty-one years, ground rent £8. and if my offer is accepted I will pay deposit of £35 and sign contract on the auction particulars."

Messrs. Jolly & Co. replied as follows :

"September 25, 1895.—Dear Sir,—On behalf of our client, Mrs. M. A. Filby, we beg to accept your offer of three hundred and fifty pounds (£350) for No. 1, Kenmure Road, Hackney, subject to contract as agreed. We inclose draft contract herewith, and shall be glad to receive same signed together with cheque for deposit at your early convenience.—Yours faithfully, Jolly & Co."

The contract inclosed was in substantially the same terms as the contract indorsed on the particulars of sale. The defendant never signed this contract, and subsequently refused to complete.

The plaintiff having brought an action for specific performance, the defendant, besides raising a defence on the merits, pleaded that the Statute of Frauds had not been complied with, and also that the acceptance of his offer by Messrs. Jolly & Co. was conditional only by virtue of the words "subject to contract as agreed."

ROMER, J., read a judgment in which he dealt with the defence raised on the merits, and continued: The next defence raised before me is that of the Statute of Frauds. This certainly gives rise to some nice questions, but I have come to the conclusion that the plea of the statute does not avail the defendant. The point arising on that plea is that which concerns the name of the vendor. The defendant says that he has signed nothing which directly or by sufficient reference sets forth in writing who the vendor is. And it is true that the plaintiff's name as vendor does not appear in the offer of purchase of Sept. 24, 1895, signed by the defendant, and that you cannot gather who the vendor is from the auction form of contract or particulars which are sufficiently referred to for identification in the offer. But the offer does contain the names of the contracting parties. The offer is to Frank Jolly & Co., and I think it makes no difference that the offer is made to them as agents for an undisclosed principal.

For the purpose of satisfying the Statute of Frauds it appears to me sufficient, so far as parties are concerned, that the written contract should show who the contracting parties are, although they or one of them may be agents or agent for others, and it makes no difference whether you can gather the fact of agency from the written document or not. Who the principals are may be proved by parole. That is well settled. This was pointed out by Wood, V.-C., in Morris v. Wilson (1), and by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Commings v. Scott (2), where he says (20 Eq. at pp. 15, 16) :

"There can be no doubt that if a written contract is made in this form, 'A. B. agrees to sell Blackacre to C. D. for £1,000,' then E. F., the principal of A. B., can sue G. H. the principal of C. D. on that contract."

The offer, then, in the case before me signed by the defendant does, in my opinion, sufficiently give the names of the contracting parties. If that be so then the statute is satisfied in that respect, for it is settled law that a signed offer in writing which sufficiently sets forth particulars may be accepted by parole, and that the signed offer simply accepted by parole sufficiently complies with the statute: see Warner v. Willington (3); and Reuss v. Picksley (4). For the purposes of this point I am now considering, the defendant's offer was accepted, and it is not necessary that he should have recognised that acceptance in writing. Nor does it appear to me material that the acceptance disclosed the name and was on behalf of the vendor, the previously undisclosed principal. A simple acceptance by Frank Jolly & Co. would be clearly sufficient, and, later on, they might have disclosed the fact that they accepted on behalf of their principal. And I cannot see that it makes any difference that they disclose at the time of acceptance the name of the principal or accept directly on behalf of the principal instead of first simply accepting it and then stating who the principal is.

I, therefore, hold that this objection fails. Indeed, I do not think the point is novel. Substantially the same point was decided by Wood, V.-C., in Morris v. Wilson (1), mentioned above, in accordance with the view I have expressed. And the cases relied upon by the defendant are distinguishable. In Potter v. Duffield (5) you could not gather from anything signed by the defendant's agent who the contracting parties were. The defendant's agent was not mentioned as a contracting party. There was no offer of any kind in writing to him as agent for the vendor or otherwise. And the same observations apply to Commings v. Scott (2) so far as relates to the first point taken by counsel on behalf of the plaintiffs in that case, and decided against them by SIR GEORGE JESSELL. In Williams v. Jordan (6) the offer to take a lease was only addressed "Sir," and you could not gather from it to whom the offer was addressed. It certainly was not addressed to the person who subsequently purported to accept it on behalf of the lessor. Lastly, in Jarrett v. Hunter (7), though that gives rise to more difficulty, the contract did not show who the vendor was, or who were the contracting parties. I gather that the solicitor for the vendor, who signed, did not purport to sign as a contracting party or on behalf of his undisclosed principal. And the point that the writing signed could or might be taken as a contract between the purchaser and the solicitor as agent for the undisclosed principal vendor was apparently not taken by the counsel for the plaintiffs or considered by the judge who decided that case.

The only other point taken on behalf of the defendant in the case before me is that the acceptance of his offer was not a simple one, but was conditional, because of the words "subject to contract as agreed." At first sight, those words may appear to make the acceptance conditional. But when the offer is carefully looked at, it appears to me that the acceptance was absolute, and not conditional. The offer stated in effect that if accepted the defendant would pay a deposit of £35 and sign the form of contract on the auction particulars. That form of contract was in writing, and was definitive in all its terms, and clearly identified by the offer. It left nothing to be agreed upon thereafter. The signing of it was a form. The contract between the parties was complete on acceptance of the offer, whether the form on the auction particulars was signed or not. I might make in this case somewhat similar observations to those which LORD CAIRNS, L.C., made in Rossiter v. Miller (8), with regard to the provision as to a further agreement to be signed by the purchaser in that case.

The acceptance, therefore, in the case now before me when it spoke of "subject to contract as agreed" was clearly only referring to the form of contract mentioned in the offer, and which the defendant had offered to sign. The acceptance of the offer was not made subject to any new terms, but was one in accordance with the terms of the offer; this being sufficiently shown by the important words "as agreed." It follows that the defendant fails in all his defences, and that the plaintiff is entitled to specific performance of the contract, with costs up to and including judgment.

The respondent, a married woman, carried on trade as a publican separately from her husband, thus making herself liable under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 1 (5) [repealed], to the operation of the bankruptcy laws. She sold the goodwill of her business, but retained the licence, and debts incurred while the business was being carried on remained unpaid. She later instructed her solicitors to issue a circular to her creditors convening a meeting and intimating, although not specifically stating in terms, that she was about to suspend payment. Two trade creditors thereupon presented a bankruptcy petition against her alleging that the issue of the circular amounted to an act of bankruptcy.

Held: the circular, being so worded as to make it a dishonest act to pay an individual creditor before the date of the creditors' meeting, amounted to an intention to suspend payment, and, therefore, to an act of bankruptcy; (ii) the respondent was "carrying on a trade" within the meaning of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 1 (5), at the time the circular was issued and would continue to do so until all her trade debts were paid; therefore, she was subject to the bankruptcy laws and a receiving order could be made against her.

In the spring of 1894 the respondent, a married woman, began to carry on the trade of a publican separately from her husband. On Dec. 15, 1894, she sold the goodwill of her business, but the licence remained in her name, and debts incurred while carrying on the business remained unpaid. On Jan. 2, 1895, a firm of solicitors, acting on her instructions, issued a notice convening a meeting of her trade creditors which ran as follows : D

"Sir,- Mrs. Dagnall has placed her affairs in our hands, and in pursuance of our advice we have received instructions to call a meeting of her creditors and lay her circumstances before them. We beg therefore to inform you that such meeting will be held at our office . . . on Tuesday next, Jan. 8, 1895 . . . Please send us at once a statement of your account . . ."

Two trade creditors thereupon presented a bankruptcy petition against the respondent alleging that the issue of the circular amounted to an act of bankruptcy. The registrar dismissed the petition and held that as the respondent had sold her business before the issue of the circular she was not carrying on trade at that time, and therefore was not subject to the bankruptcy laws. The petitioning creditors F appealed.

Bigham, Q.C., and Glen for the appellants.

Witt, Q.C., and Poley for the respondent.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question we have to decide is whether this married woman was, when this circular was issued, subject to the bankruptcy laws. G There is no doubt that at one time she had been engaged in trade, and on Dec. 15 she sold her business. On Jan 2, through her solicitor, she issued a circular to her creditors intimating an intention to suspend payment. It has been suggested that the circular does not amount to an act of bankruptcy, because it was not stated in terms that payment was about to be suspended. In my opinion the circular was so worded that it would have been a dishonest act to pay the creditors separately, after its issue and before the meeting was convened, and for that reason it amounted to an intention to suspend. H

The other point turns on the interpretation to be placed upon s. 1 (5) of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. [His LORDSHIP read the sub-section.] Counsel for the appellants say that the meaning of this sub-section is that if a married woman has once made herself liable to the bankruptcy laws by engaging in I trade, she cannot by retiring from trade divest herself of that liability. In my opinion this is not the true construction. I think that the statute means by "carrying on" so long as she carries on and no longer. What constitutes "carrying on" trade is a pure question of fact to be decided in every individual case, and if it was not for the decision in Re Stevens, Ex parte M'George (1), I should have had no difficulty in holding that the "carrying on" continued till the trade debts were paid. It seems to me that the trading cannot be considered complete until all the

A obligations incurred in the trading are discharged. If I had been sitting as a jurymen, I should have found that this lady was engaged in trade at the time when the circular was issued. This was the view taken in all the other cases, and I have to consider whether the decision in Ex parte M'George (1) prevents me from holding that the nonpayment of the debts of this married woman amounts to a carrying on of trade.

B The decision in that case was on the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and I do not consider it has any bearing on the construction which should be placed on this section of the Married Women's Property Act. It is an Act which enables a married woman to do what she could not previously do, and it defines the liabilities to which she is in consequence to be subject. The intention of s. 1 (5) of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, is to define how far a married woman engaged in trade incurs a personal liability with respect to particular debts. In my opinion liability for trade debts is included by this sub-section in the words "carrying on trade." I think the debtor was carrying on trade when this notice was issued, and that the appeal must be allowed.

D WRIGHT, J.—I agree. In my judgment the natural meaning of the statute is that a married woman who carries on trade is liable to the bankruptcy laws, and that she does not cease to carry on trade, and cannot divest herself of that liability while her trade debts are unpaid. I think the cases cited have no bearing on the interpretation of this statute.

Appeal by judgment creditors from an order of the registrar setting aside a bankruptcy notice which had been served upon the judgment debtor.

On June 13, 1896, Messrs. Beyer, Peacock & Co. obtained judgment against Clark the debtor for £4,000. On June 23 a bankruptcy notice in respect of this judgment debt, which had been issued on the application of the judgment creditors, was served upon the judgment debtor in England. On July 14 the registrar, upon the application of the judgment debtor, made an order setting aside the bankruptcy notice. He found that the debtor was a foreign subject domiciled and resident out of the jurisdiction at the time when the bankruptcy notice was issued, and when it was served; that the debtor had not ordinarily resided or had a dwelling-house or place of business in England within twelve months of that time; and that when the bankruptcy notice was issued the debtor was not within the jurisdiction. The judgment creditors appealed. D

The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides :

“Section 4.—(1.) A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy in each of the following cases : (g) If a creditor has obtained a final judgment against him for any amount, and, execution thereon not having been stayed, has served on him in England, or, by leave of the court, elsewhere, a bankruptcy notice under this Act, requiring him to pay the judgment debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment, or to secure or compound for it to the satisfaction of the creditor or the court, and he does not within seven days after service of the notice, in case the service is effected in England, and, in case the service is effected elsewhere, then within the time limited in that behalf by the order giving leave to effect the service, either comply with the requirements of the notice or satisfy the court that he has a counterclaim, set-off, or cross-demand which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt, and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained. E

(2.) A bankruptcy notice under this Act shall be in the prescribed form, and shall state the consequences of non-compliance therewith, and shall be served in the prescribed manner. F

Section 6.—(1.) A creditor shall not be entitled to present a bankruptcy petition against a debtor unless (d) the debtor is domiciled in England, or, within a year before the date of the presentation of the petition, has ordinarily resided, or had a dwelling-house or place of business, in England.” G

T. Willes Chitty and Herbert Chitty for the judgment creditors. H
Muir Mackenzie for the debtor. I

LINDLEY, L.J.—In my opinion the contention of the creditors is well founded and must succeed. The question on this appeal arises upon the construction of s. 4 (1) (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. In this case the creditors had obtained a final judgment against Clark, and Clark was therefore a debtor against whom a final judgment had been obtained. On June 23 a bankruptcy notice in respect of that judgment debt was served upon the debtor, who had then returned to England and rendered himself liable to be proceeded against under the English bankruptcy laws. It was contended for the debtor that he was not a "debtor" within the meaning of s. 4 of the Bankruptcy Act when the bankruptcy notice was issued, because he was a foreigner out of the jurisdiction at that time. The question we have to determine is, whether there was anything wrong in the issue of the bankruptcy notice.

The construction which we are asked to put upon s. 4 is a very narrow one. I cannot see why we should so construe that section. The question really is whether there was a good service of the notice, and I think that there was. I cannot see how the issue of the bankruptcy notice can be objected to. The bankruptcy notice, therefore, in this case was valid, and ought not to have been set aside. The point raised by the creditors is a good one, and this appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—I think that s. 4 (1) (g), must be considered apart from the provisions of s. 6 (1) (d). Section 4 (1) (g), says that a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy

"if a creditor has obtained a final judgment against him for any amount, and execution thereon not having been stayed, has served on him in England . . . a bankruptcy notice under this Act, . . ."

In my opinion, this case is brought within both the words and the meaning of that section. The debtor is clearly a debtor, and the creditor has obtained final judgment against him.

I agree that "debtor" means a debtor who is subject to the bankruptcy law of this country. This debtor came to England in June last. When he came to this country he became a debtor subject to the bankruptcy law of this country. That being so, he had served upon him a bankruptcy notice which complied in every respect with the terms of s. 4 (1) (g). That being so, the section has been complied with; it says "has been served on him in England," but says nothing about the issue of the notice. Here the debtor had served on him in England this bankruptcy notice.

The point has been made that the bankruptcy notice was issued while the debtor was abroad, and that it is therefore invalid. I cannot think that that fact is important. This seems to me to be very analogous to the case of a writ of summons which is often issued when the defendant is out of the country and is afterwards served upon him when he comes within the jurisdiction. If the contention of the debtor were correct, what an extraordinary state of things would exist. If the bankruptcy notice were issued an hour before the debtor landed in England, it would be bad; but, if it were issued an hour after he landed, it would be good. I am of opinion that this bankruptcy notice was a good notice, and that it ought not to have been set aside. The appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The issuing of a bankruptcy notice does not affect the debtor in any way. It is not until the bankruptcy notice is served upon him that the debtor is in any way affected. For that reason, in s. 4 (1) (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the service of a bankruptcy notice upon a debtor is provided for, and nothing is said as to the issue of the notice. The bankruptcy notice cannot be served until it has been issued. The important fact which is necessary to bring a debtor within the bankruptcy law is the service of the bankruptcy notice. As the service in this case was effected in this country, the debtor was at the time of service a debtor subject to the bankruptcy law of this country. I can see no reason why this bankruptcy notice should be set aside, and I think that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal by a bankrupt from a decision of the deputy judge of the Croydon County Court, suspending his discharge for five years, from Feb. 9, 1897.

The receiving order and the order for adjudication were both made on Mar. 6, 1894. The liabilities amounted to about £750, and the assets realised £109 10s. 1d., and dividends amounting to 1s. 2d. in the pound had been paid. The report of the official receiver showed that the bankrupt had started business in 1887 with borrowed money, £120 of which he had never repaid, and that in June, 1891, he had effected a private arrangement with his creditors under which he had paid 11s. 4d. in the pound. Under that arrangement £100 owing to his friends was excluded, and was scheduled in this bankruptcy. The report also showed that trade debts to the amount of £258 16s. 6d. had been incurred with a knowledge of insolvency; but that the debtor had been put to great expense by illness in his family, and had not been guilty of any extravagance.

F. O. Robinson, in support of the appeal, which was unopposed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—We are of the opinion that in this case more severity has been exercised than is desirable. There is no doubt as to our right to review the length of the term of suspension, and in our judgment suspension for five years should be reserved for very bad cases. We think that the justice of the case will be met by suspending the discharge of the bankrupt for two years from the date of the order in the county court.

Case Stated by a metropolitan police magistrate sitting at Bow Street Police Court.

At the hearing on Jan. 11, 1899, of a complaint made by the appellant against the respondents in which the appellant claimed £4 8s. from the respondents for two weeks' wages in lieu of notice the following facts were proved. On Dec. 16, 1898, the appellant was engaged in the care and management of a printing press of the value of £800, used by him in the respondents' printing business, when a roller known as the "top-rider" jammed under the cylinder, doing damage to the machine to the extent of £30. On being asked by the respondents' manager for an explanation of the cause of the accident, the appellant stated that the "top-rider" had jumped out of the forks in which it should revolve. The manager, believing that the accident was due to the appellant's want of care, and that he had caused it by neglecting to place one end of the "top-rider" in the forks before he started the machine as it was his duty to do, paid the appellant his wages up to that day and dismissed him without notice. The magistrate was satisfied on the evidence that the only way in which the accident could have occurred was by the appellant's forgetfulness to fix the end of the "top-rider" in the forks before starting the machine, notwithstanding the appellant's strong belief that he had done so; and he held that such forgetfulness in the performance of an important part of the appellant's duty amounted to neglect which justified his dismissal without notice. The appellant now appealed.

W. M. Thompson for the appellant.

Colam for the respondent.

DARLING, J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the magistrate was right. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and the magistrate's finding, and continued:] It has been argued for the appellant that mere forgetfulness is not a ground for summary dismissal, but I do not think that that argument is well founded. I think that to forget to do something which it is of great importance that the servant should remember may show such a disregard to the master's interests as amounts to neglect. Neglect as often arises from forgetfulness as from anything else; and if the forgetfulness be with respect to an important thing, it may well, in my opinion, be good ground for dismissing the servant without notice. To forget to do some trivial or not very important thing in the business is not enough to justify dismissal; but to forget to do a thing which, if it be not done, may cause serious damage or injury, may be a serious neglect of duty, and forgetfulness of that kind may be most serious, and may justify dismissal. Take the case of a signaller on a railway who does not attend to his signals. That would be a serious matter, and yet nobody would say that his omission was anything but forgetfulness; but could it be said, in view of the serious consequences that might result, that such forgetfulness was not a serious neglect of his duty? It has been argued that forgetfulness is not enough unless it be habitual forgetfulness. How are we to say how many instances of forgetfulness will be required before they amount to such neglect as would justify dismissal? We could not possibly do so. The question must depend on the circumstances of each case.

In the present case, we have a machine worth £800, and it is damaged to the extent of £30 by the appellant's forgetfulness. I think that that was evidence of neglect to justify dismissal. But it is said that the machine was so complicated that a mere act of forgetfulness ought not to be sufficient. That argument may operate against the workmen themselves, as one act of forgetfulness on the part of one of them in charge of the machinery may sacrifice the lives of hundreds of them; and yet it is gravely contended that forgetfulness should not be held to be negligence unless it is habitual. I am unable to see that. The working classes themselves are more in danger of sustaining injuries through accidents caused by acts of forgetfulness on the part of those in charge of machinery than any other class, and when we consider the working of mines and railways in this country, and remember that one act of forgetfulness may cost the lives of hundreds, it is impossible to say that one act of forgetfulness may not be a sufficient reason for dismissal or that forgetfulness while in charge of complicated machinery should be looked on with leniency.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is not possible, and I shall not attempt, to give any exact definition of what amount of forgetfulness may justify dismissal without notice. It depends on the character of the act of forgetfulness and the character of the work which the workman has to do. I think that it is a question of fact and degree in each case, and the magistrate here has decided that the forgetfulness of the appellant in the performance of an important part of his duty amounted to neglect which justified his dismissal. I cannot say that the magistrate was wrong in the conclusion he came to. I think that the question is one of fact and degree in all cases.

By the Finance Act, 1894, s. 14 (1): “In the case of property which does not pass to the executor as such, an amount equal to the proper rateable part of the estate duty may be recovered by the person, who being authorised or required to pay the estate duty in respect of any property has paid such duty, from the person entitled to any sum charged on such property . . . under a disposition not containing any express provision to the contrary.”

In 1861 donees of a power charged settled estates with a jointure of £1,000 per annum in favour of the wife of one of the donees “without any deduction whatsoever except in respect of income tax.” On the death of the surviving donee in 1896 the whole settled estates passed and became liable to estate duty, and the jointress became entitled to receive her jointure.

Held: no part of the estate duty was payable by the jointress, as the words used amounted to “an express provision to the contrary” within the Finance Act, 1894, s. 14 (1).

In the exercise of a power of appointment, the life tenant of settled estates appointed a jointure rentcharge of £500 per annum to his wife if she should survive him, and secured the rentcharge on the whole of the settled property. The application of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 14 (1), was not excluded. On the death of the life tenant leaving his wife surviving the whole of the settled property passed and became liable to estate duty. On the question of the incidence of the estate duty,

Held: the jointress must pay interest on a rateable proportion of the estate duty according to the value of the slice of the settled property required to produce her rentcharge.

Adjourned Summons.

By an indenture of settlement dated Dec. 10, 1861, executed on the marriage of Edward John Parker-Jervis with Grace Catherine Jervis, Edward Swynfen Parker-Jervis and Edward John Parker-Jervis in exercise of powers conferred on them by a previous settlement of Mar. 27, 1861, conveyed settled estates known as the Stone Aston Estate to the use of trustees for eighty years to secure Mrs. Edward John Parker-Jervis in the event of her surviving Edward John Parker-Jervis an annuity of £800 during the joint lives of herself and Edward Swynfen Parker-Jervis, and in case she should survive both Edward Swynfen Parker-Jervis and Edward John Parker-Jervis, that she should thenceforth during her life receive a jointure of £1,000 per annum "without any deduction whatsoever except in respect of income tax," with remainder to trustees for two hundred years to secure the jointure, with remainder to trustees for five hundred years on trust for raising portions for the younger children of the marriage, with remainder to the use of the first son of the marriage in tail male, with divers remainders over. Edward John Parker-Jervis died on July 31, 1868, in the lifetime of his father, Edward Swynfen Parker-Jervis, and his widow subsequently married William Locker, who died in 1885.

By a disentailing deed and resettlement dated Nov. 14, 1884, Edward Swynfen Parker-Jervis and his grandson Edward St. Vincent Parker-Jervis (the son of Mrs. Edward John Parker-Jervis, now Mrs. Locker) resettled, inter alia, the Stone Aston Estate (subject to the annuity and jointure in favour of Mrs. Locker, and the portions for younger children, contained in the deed of Dec. 10, 1861) to such uses as Edward Swynfen Parker-Jervis and Edward St. Vincent Parker-Jervis should by deed jointly appoint, with remainder to Edward Swynfen Parker-Jervis for life, with remainder to Edward St. Vincent Parker-Jervis for life with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male with divers remainders over. Power was thereby given to Edward Swynfen Parker-Jervis to appoint to a future wife (his first wife having died) a jointure of £500 per annum, and to charge the estates thereby settled with portions for his then present or future children and to secure such jointure and portions by limiting a term or terms in the settled estates and it was thereby declared that the last-mentioned powers of jointuring and charging portions were to be substituted for the original powers which were contained in the deed of Dec. 10, 1861, which powers were thereby released by Edward Swynfen Parker-Jervis.

Edward Swynfen Parker-Jervis, by a settlement dated July 10, 1886, made on his marriage with Maude Parker-Jervis, appointed, under the powers given him by the resettlement of Nov. 14, 1884, a jointure of £500 per annum to Maude Parker-Jervis if she should survive him, and secured the same on all the estates settled by the deed of Nov. 14, 1884. There was no issue of this marriage.

By an indenture of Feb. 20, 1896, the Reversionary and General Securities Co., Ltd., as mortgagees of the life estate of Edward St. Vincent Parker-Jervis, granted and assigned the lands, hereditaments, money, and investments, subject to the uses or trusts of the deed of Nov. 14, 1884, to John Saltren Willett his executors, administrators, and assigns for the term of one hundred years as therein set out. John Saltren Willett subsequently mortgaged his interest in the settled estates to the University Life Assurance Society.

Edward Swynfen Parker-Jervis died on Jan. 3, 1896, whereupon the Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, in respect of all the property comprised in the deed of Nov. 14, 1884, as passing on the death of Edward Swynfen Parker-Jervis including Mrs. Locker's jointure of £1,000 per annum and Mrs. Maude Parker-Jervis's jointure of £500 per annum. The duty claimed on the aggregated property passing on the death was assessed at seven per cent., the principal value being calculated at between twenty-four and twenty-five years' purchase, but as Mrs. Locker's jointure of £1,000 did not arise under a disposition made by the deceased Edward Swynfen Parker-Jervis, but under the settlement of Mar. 27, 1861, the commissioners excepted from the aggregated property a portion assessed by them at £24,640 (being the principal value of the jointure capitalised at between twenty-four and twenty-five years' purchase like the rest of the estate) on which portion they charged duty at the rate of four per cent.

This summons was taken out by the trustees of the term of five hundred years and generally of the settlement of Dec. 10, 1861, and of the resettlement of Nov. 14, 1884, to which Mrs. Locker, Mrs. Maude Parker-Jervis, St. Vincent John Parker-Jervis (tenant in tail in remainder, eldest son of Edward St. Vincent Parker-Jervis), John Saltren Willett, and the University Life Assurance Society were made defendants. The summons asked (i) whether the plaintiffs, as such trustees as aforesaid, had power under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 9 (5), to raise the amount of the estate duty payable on the death of Edward Swynfen Parker-Jervis in respect of the jointure of £1,000 charged in favour of Mrs. Locker on the Stone Aston Estates, and any interest and expenses properly paid or incurred by them in respect thereof by a mortgage of the said estates or a part thereof, notwithstanding that such jointure had been treated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the purposes of estate duty as an estate by itself, and had not been aggregated with any other property passing on the death of Edward Swynfen Parker-Jervis; (ii) how the estate duty payable in respect of the jointure of £1,000 was to be borne as between the persons interested in the Stone Aston Estates, and in particular whether such estate duty ought to be repaid by Mrs. Locker to the plaintiffs or other persons paying the same, or whether she ought to pay interest upon the amount of such duty to John Saltren Willett and the University Life Assurance Society, and if so, at what rate; (iii) how the proportion of the estate duty payable on the death of Edward Swynfen Parker-Jervis in respect of the estates comprised in the indenture of re-settlement of Nov. 14, 1884, to be borne by Maude Parker-Jervis, as being entitled to the jointure of £500 charged thereon was to be determined; and (iv) whether Maude Parker-Jervis would be entitled to charge the proportion of estate duty to be borne by her as aforesaid upon the corpus of the estates, and, if so, on what terms as to interest or otherwise.

At the hearing of the summons a point was taken on the first question raised as to whether the trustees could properly be held accountable for and had the power to raise the duty on the whole of the settled estates, or whether the power of raising the duty and the liability for payment devolved on J. S. Willett, the assignee of the legal tenant for life. J. S. Willett, however, consented to concur in the proposed mortgage, and his Lordship then, without determining whether the plaintiffs as such trustees as aforesaid had power to raise the duty, declared that J. S. Willett as tenant for life had power to raise the duty payable in respect of the whole of the estates, including Mrs. Locker's jointure, and any interest and expenses properly paid or incurred in respect thereof by a mortgage of the estates or part thereof, and directed the plaintiffs to raise so much of the duty on the whole estates, including Mrs. Locker's jointure, as they should think fit out of the settled personalty, the residue of the duty to be raised by J. S. Willett by mortgage of part of the estates on the request of the plaintiffs. A

KEKEWICH, J.— There are two questions to be decided, both arising under the Finance Act, but otherwise of an entirely different character, even though they both concern annuities and both those annuities are jointure rentcharges. I will deal first with the question whether Mrs. Locker is entitled to be paid her annuity or jointure free from any deduction in respect of the estate duty leviable on the property out of which that annuity is payable and on which it is charged. If it should appear that she is bound to contribute to the estate duty, then the further question will arise, what proportion ought she to pay, a question which equally arises as regards the other annuity to Mrs. Maude Parker-Jervis, and which may be considered as completely distinct from the first question. C

Without looking for the moment at any authorities, and without for the moment referring to the Act, let me consider the contract between the parties, because this is a contract. This is a settlement whereby an annuity is charged in the proper form on the estate for the benefit of Mrs. Locker who is a contracting party. If the parties in so many words said the annuity is to be paid free of any charge whatever, the owner of the property who charges that property with the annuity has contracted that so many pounds shall come to the hands of the person in whose favour he makes the charge, and it is rather startling to be told that that contract shall not take effect and that some deduction shall nevertheless be made and that the person entitled to the charge shall not receive the amount stated, but something less. Many persons no doubt think that they are going to receive certain sums annually or quarterly and do not receive them because the revenue makes certain deductions. I suppose that any member of the Bar, on receiving an appointment to the Bench, might think he was going to receive a salary of a certain amount, but he would soon find out his mistake, because the revenue takes care that he does not. The money is retained as against him and as against everybody else for income tax and all the decisions as regards income tax have gone on that footing, that although it is possible to provide for the payment of an annuity clear of income tax it has to be done by cumbrous machinery, and it is, in effect, necessary to provide that in addition to an annuity chargeable with income tax, there shall be a further annuity equivalent to the income tax, varying according as the income tax rises or falls. But that, so far as I am aware, has never been extended to any other tax, and it has never been said, so far as I am aware, that other taxes are not deductions. By some legal interpretation it has been held again and again that income tax is not a deduction. To take one example, Wood, V.-C., says in Turner v. Mullineux (1) (1 John. & H. at p. 335), quoted by Kay, L.J., in Gleadow v. Leatham (2) (22 Ch.D. at p. 272): "This court always holds that income tax is not a deduction." It really is not in one sense, because it is a sum paid by the person entitled to the annuity, paid in respect of the income which he receives. It is not really chargeable until he really receives the income. In that sense it is logically and technically not a deduction. Every other tax that prevents the annuity coming into the hands of the annuitant clear has always been held, so far as I am aware, to be a deduction. D

Turning to this settlement, I find that the parties have contracted that Mrs. Locker shall be paid the £1,000 a year without any deduction whatever, except in respect of income tax. There is no attempt to make it clear of income tax, and not only that, there not being any desire to make it clear of income tax, the usual words are put in the settlement. Then it is said that the words "without any deduction" do not refer to estate duty because that is not a deduction. It is unnecessary to say more on that point than I have already said. But it was urged that this was a settlement made in 1861, and it is therefore impossible that the contracting parties could have contemplated such a charge as this estate duty which is imposed more than thirty years afterwards. It is a sufficient answer to say that the parties did not contemplate that or any other duty; what they did contemplate was that the annuity should be paid without any deduction whatever, and I think it is only fair to say that they must be taken to have contemplated some possible deduction for tax because they have excepted deductions in respect of income tax. But one need not dwell much on that, because the parties have contracted for the annuities to be paid without any deduction whatever, and if the argument prevails that Mrs. Locker is to take £1,000 a year less some sum to be ascertained for estate duty, she will not get £1,000 a year. She will get £1,000 a year with a deduction, less some sum in respect of the estate duty. That seems to me to be not in accordance with the contract. Here I have these words "without any deduction whatever," and I think that means on the contract that there was to be no deduction in the events which have happened in respect of the estate duty.

I am told, however, that apart from the contract, the Finance Act, 1894, is against my interpretation, and that depends on s. 14 (1) which provides that where the person who pays the estate duty, pays the whole of it, then he may recover from the person entitled to any sum charged on the property a rateable proportion, that is the proper proportion which the owner of the charge ought to provide; but that must be under a disposition not containing any express provision to the contrary. The provision here is not express, no doubt, in the sense which I have mentioned and which was argued to be the right one; there is no express mention here of the estate duty, but I see no difficulty myself in saying that an express provision is one which expressly provides against any deduction fairly including the deduction in question, and it is not necessary to say that there must be an express provision mentioning estate duty. One observation probably will be sufficient to deal with that. If that argument is sound no settlement dated before the passing of the Finance Act, 1894, or at any rate before it was known to the public that this estate duty was contemplated by Parliament, could possibly contain an express provision because it would have been impossible before it was passed by Parliament for anyone to frame words which would expressly mention the estate duty which was afterwards imposed. Reference has been made to Re Countess of Orford, Cartwright v. Duc del Balzo (3). In one sense it does apply. It is directly applicable to the case in hand but for the words "under a disposition not containing any express words to the contrary."

The other point is a much more difficult one. The question is how the duty chargeable to the jointress, Mrs. Maude Parker-Jervis, is to be ascertained—a question which has not been dealt with and probably did not occur to the framers of the Finance Act, 1894, in its full difficulty, and therefore we have no full provision directly dealing with it. All one can do is to see what was the intention of the legislature having regard to the general scheme of the Act and to those special provisions which bear on it. How is Mrs. Maude Parker-Jervis, who is entitled to a jointure, to be charged. She must be charged with some duty; some deduction must be made in respect of her duty. It is practically immaterial for this purpose whether the duty is charged on the whole or any part of the estate. I do not wish to encumber my view of the case with any distinction on that ground. I do not think so far as I can see, that that makes any difference whatever.

The first point which occurs to me to guide my decision is that the estate duty is by the Act charged on the property. It is quite unnecessary to go through the Act for that purpose, but it is the property which passes which is charged. It is the property which as a whole passes by the death which is charged with the estate duty. The legislature does not concern itself as between the owner of the estate, the taxpayer, and the taxed property for the purpose of ascertaining what is to be paid to the Revenue. The legislature takes the estate as a whole passing on the death, A and says that property, whatever it is, shall be charged with duty at a certain rate.

 On that principle the duty is ascertained, and it has to be paid by some person.
 Then, not for the sake of the Revenue at all, which is already thoroughly protected, but for the sake of assisting different persons to bear their own burdens in the proper rateable proportions, the Act contains several provisions distributing these burdens, and the question is how those burdens are to be distributed. Mrs. Maude Parker- B Jervis is entitled to a jointure of so much chargeable on the estate, the whole of which is chargeable with the duty. One very ready way of ascertaining her proportion is to say, "You are entitled to a jointure of £500 a year, payable out of property which realises more than that, and you must bear the burden in exact proportion to the capital value of your jointure. The duty is charged on the capital C value of the whole. You are entitled to something which, though it is an annual charge, and an annual charge of a limited duration, yet is capable of valuation by the simplest possible means, that is to say, by an actuarial assessment, and you must pay the duty on that." For many purposes the actuarial assessment is the very best possible way, and if you apply it to a very large number of cases so as to strike an average, it would on that average work with very great fairness. Many D cases have come before me to illustrate that. But the question is whether that ought to be applied to a case which is one of a large number of cases where neither party can possibly have the benefit of the average. It is all very well to say that if you take a score or more jointresses and assess their jointures on the actuarial principle, they would not between them pay too much or too little, but would pay really exactly what they ought to pay, but it is another thing to say Mrs. Maude E Parker-Jervis will not pay too much. It is quite possible that she may pay more than is a reasonable proportion attributable to her interest. On the other hand, if she live to an old age it is quite possible that she may have an advantage and pay too little, but it seems to me it is so problematical, so speculative, that I ought not to adopt that view if there is any other possible view.

There is another possible view, and it is on the whole a reasonable one which I F ought to adopt. I do not propose to go through the sections of the Act, but it seems to me tolerably clear that this lady is entitled to a charge on the estate for the duty which she pays, and that whatever part of the duty she or anyone else pays is by the Act imposed on the estate and is paid out of the inheritance. If she were liable to pay the duty in the first instance, she would be entitled to a charge for what she paid.
 That seems to me to be so under s. 9 of the Act. She would be in the position of a G person having a charge on the estate and in respect of that charge would have to be paid. She is entitled, so it seems to me, to say: "You charge that duty on the whole estate, and, so far as I am a mortgagee, though of a limited character, I must keep down the interest on that charge; I shall only do it during my life; it may be a short time or a long time." Then the answer to that is: "Yes, but on your death there will be nobody left to pay that interest and the result will be that it H will have to be borne by the inheritance; it may be by a tenant for life in possession or by a tenant in tail, but practically in legal language it will have to be borne by the inheritance." That is quite fair. I think that is exactly the scheme of the Act.
 The scheme of the Act is that the duty shall be levied on the inheritance and the inheritance shall bear it. I think it would be going contrary to the general scheme of the Act if I were to say that any part of the capital sum of the duty as a whole I ought to be borne by any person having a limited interest. No doubt in one sense every person having a limited interest bears a proportion of the duty. He bears it in proportion to his limited interest. The tenant for life unfortunately bears a heavy burden. He bears it in this way, that instead of having the clear income which his predecessor had—I am speaking of course of estates free from incumbrances—he has it less a charge on the property which has to be raised by mortgage or otherwise, and the result is that he has to pay his £4 per cent., or whatever it is, on that charge during his life. If the property is sold he has less income from the property. If the duty is paid out of capital money there is a cesser of interest arising from that capital money, but in either case the burden of the duty is cast on the inheritance.

If the view which I take is the right one, and this lady has to bear her proportion of the duty during her life, the same thing will follow. The jointress is a limited owner, and she must pay interest on the rateable part of the duty ascertained according to her rateable proportion of the entire property. The rest of the property will be that of which the tenant for life remains in possession, and he will have to pay interest on the duty charged on that in proportion, and so during their joint lives they will divide the charge in a fair way. If she dies first he will pay the interest on the whole. That seems to me to be the scheme of the Act, and, having gone through the different clauses, I am of opinion that they all point that way, and I have not seen any clause which in the slightest degree contradicts it. I repeat there is no particular provision in the Act to that effect; it seems to me to have been left very much at large. But I have to consider how best to ascertain that which is undoubtedly true, namely, that the jointress must bear a fair proportion of the duty. I think that is the way to do it. We know here what the principal value of this jointure is. The parties have ascertained it; but, if they had not, it would have been necessary to ascertain what proportion of the whole estate was required to produce the jointure, that is, so much of the estate as is represented by the jointure. A rateable part of the duty levied on the whole estate must then be paid in respect of that portion of the estate. That sum will actually be, or will be supposed to be, raised by mortgage, or it may be paid by appropriation of capital money, and the jointress must pay interest during her life on that sum at such rate as may be negotiated.

Profit à Prendre—Fishery—Grant of exclusive right of fishing with rod and line—

A grant from the freeholder of an exclusive right of fishing with rod and line for a specified term of years at a certain rental in part of a river is not a mere licence, but implies a right to take away the fish when caught, and is a profit à prendre. Therefore, the grantees of such an incorporeal hereditament have a right of action against any person who pollutes the river to the prejudice of, and injury and damage to, the grantees and their fisheries.

The True Waltonian Society, which was established in 1830 and consisted of forty members, had a fishery at Rickmansworth in the river Colne extending from Tolpits Bridge, down to Springwell, and thence along the Grand Junction Canal and the back river of the Colne about a mile and a half; the length of the whole fishery was nearly five miles. By an indenture dated Sept. 7, 1891, and made between the freeholder, Lord Ebury, (the "lessor") of the one part and the plaintiffs, Charles Fitzgerald, Edward Bawdon and Arthur Price, three officers of the Society, of the other part, the lessor had granted to the plaintiffs the upper portion of the fishery running from Tolpits Bridge to Mill End Bridge, a distance of about two miles. The deed witnessed that, for the considerations thereafter mentioned, and subject to the rent, covenants, and conditions thereafter contained, the lessor did thereby grant to the lessees for the period thereafter mentioned "the exclusive right of fishing" in the part of the river Colne, thereafter specified, together with a right of way for the purpose of exercising such right of fishing along both banks of the river; that the right of fishing should only extend to fair rod-and-line angling at proper seasons, and to netting for the sole purpose of procuring fish baits; that the grant should be for the term of fifteen years from Mar. 25, 1891, at a rental of £50 per annum for the first five years, £75 per annum for the second five years, and £100 per annum for the last five years, determinable nevertheless as therein mentioned; that the liabilities of the lessees to the lessor thereunder should consist of and be limited to the following obligations: The lessees should, at their own expense, cut and keep down the weeds in a specified portion of the river, and also attend to the banks of such portion of the river at such times and in such manner as theretofore carried out by them, and should during every period of five years of the term thereby granted expend a sum of not less than £166 in such weed-cutting, banking, and the stocking of the fishery; but that such specified outlay of £166 during each of such periods of five years should be exclusive of, and additional to, the disbursement on the river for fish-stocking alone of the sum of £200 then in the hands of, and to be retained by, the lessees as the agreed net balance of the sum of £440 recently recovered by the lessor and lessees in a certain action.

The lower part of the fishery, about three miles long, was held under a grant from one Shakell, the freeholder, for a term of 21 years from Mar. 25, 1895, and was in substantially the same terms as the deed of Sept. 7, 1891. During the five years preceding the action the society had spent a total sum of £1,155, a yearly average sum of £231, in maintaining, stocking and preserving the fisheries.

In August, 1895, the plaintiffs noticed that the water was coming from the Chess and its branches into the fishery in a disturbed condition, so as to interfere seriously with the fishing and it was ascertained that the source of pollution were the gravel works of the defendant, Joseph Firbank, a railway contractor, at Rickmansworth. The pollution consisted of the discharge of dissolved London clay, gravel-washings, and other suspended matter into the plaintiffs' water by the defendant at three points, viz., where the Chess entered the Colne at the Grand Junction Canal Iron Bridge, where the Bury Stream (a branch of the Chess) entered the Colne below the first weir, and where the Town Ditch (also a branch of the Chess) ran into the Colne at the Culvert. The pollution was such as to discolour the water, and render it so muddy and turbid and thick with suspended matter and grit, that all angling was stopped, that the fish were driven away, and that the weeds could not be cut, both because they were hidden by the turbid and muddy water, and because the grit settled upon them so thickly that they were very hard to cut. The result was that not only trout, but also coarse fish, had been driven almost entirely out of the plaintiffs' fisheries, the fish left in the river were rendered less ready to take and were kept short of food, and the suspended matter formed deposits on the spawning beds, and so made them unfit for spawning fish, and would prevent the hatching of ova and rearing of young fry.

By this action the plaintiffs, on behalf of the Society, claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant, his agents, workmen, and servants, from polluting the rivers Chess and Colne, to the prejudice of, and injury and damage to, the plaintiffs and their fisheries, in the river Colne, and more especially from discharging into such rivers large quantities of water thick with yellow mud and other suspended matters, and from doing anything to injure the fish or fishing, or to silt up or otherwise prejudicially affect, injure, or damage the plaintiffs or their fisheries. They also claimed damages for the injuries already done, and any necessary inquiry. The action was set down for trial without pleadings.

The defendant having ceased to discharge the matter complained of into the river before the trial of the action, the case was argued on the question of damages. KEKEWICH, J., awarded the plaintiffs £150 damages, and the defendant appealed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The plaintiffs in this case are the grantees—I am reading from Lord Ebury's grant—of an exclusive right of fishing in the river Colne in Hertfordshire. The right of fishing thereby granted is only to extend to fair rod-and-line angling at proper seasons, and to netting for the sole purpose of procuring fish baits.

Then there are provisions which may or may not be important, namely, that the lessees are to cut and keep down the weeds and attend to the banks and re-stock with fish. A

The first question is, what is granted by this deed? What passed to the grantees by the words "exclusive right of fishing?" Counsel for the defendant wanted to persuade us that they did not include the right of catching and taking away the fish caught—that it was a licence to hook and to return the fish when hooked to the water, I suppose. No authority whatever was brought to our attention in support of so very strange a contention as that; and, on looking into the authorities which one is accustomed to refer to in cases of this kind, one sees that such a proposition as that cannot for a moment be maintained. The law was laid down in Smith v. Kemp (1), and is repeated in COMYN'S DIGEST (5th Edn.), vol. 5, p. 362, tit. "Piscary": B C

"If a grant be de libera piscaria, the grantee shall have the property of the fish there, and shall maintain trespass for fishing there."

With reference to the right of taking away the fish hooked, you cannot draw any distinction between one kind of right of fishing and another. If a person chooses to pay anything for the sport of catching fish and returning them to the water, of course, he can do so; but that is not what is understood by lawyers or men of sense as a right of fishing. The right of fishing includes the right to take away fish unless the contrary is expressly stipulated. I have not the slightest doubt about that. Therefore, the plaintiffs have got a right of some sort as distinguished from a mere revocable licence. D

What is that? It is a good deal more than an easement; it is what is commonly called a profit à prendre. It is of such a nature that a person who enjoys that right has such possessory rights that he can bring an action for trespass at common law for the infringement of those rights. That is very old law; but it was very carefully considered, and the law will be found laid down, in Holford v. Bailey (2), which came before the Court of Exchequer Chamber. Again, if he has a possessory right, and if not a grantee by deed, but only claiming under an agreement, he can be said to have the use and occupation of the right: that was decided in Holford v. Pritchard (3). Therefore, we have the plaintiffs' rights pretty accurately defined. E F

The plaintiffs having got those rights, what has the defendant done? Has he interfered with them? He has not challenged those rights at all, but he has done that which prevents the plaintiffs from exercising those rights to the extent to which they would be entitled and would exercise them if not wrongfully prevented. What has the defendant done? He has worked out some gravel pits, and has washed the gravel, and has turned the dirty water containing a quantity of silt into the river Chess. That silt has found its way down to the river Colne, and has damnified the plaintiffs to this extent, that it has driven away the fish and injured the breeding there. Is that what is called a daumum sine injuria? It cannot be so, if I am correct in the first proposition that the plaintiffs have rights, and that those rights have been damnified, and damnified by fouling the river. What justification has the defendant for fouling the river Colne to the damage of anybody who has rights in that river? None at all. He was a wrong-doer the moment he sent the silt into the river. If the plaintiffs had no rights in the river, of course, they had no right legally to complain. It seems to me that this is a somewhat unusual case, and I am not aware of any precedent for what I may describe as an action of nuisance by the owner of a sole and exclusive right of fishing; but once grant such a right, he can sue in trespass for it. I cannot see why he could not maintain an action on the case for nuisance at common law. It seems to me that there is nothing in the points raised by the appellant when they are closely looked at, and that, therefore, the appeal must be dismissed with costs. G H I

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question that we have to consider is, What passes by this grant? There are two grants, but the same words are used in both, and I need only refer to Lord Ebury's grant. What is given in that grant is the exclusive right of fishing. It was argued by counsel for the defendant that all that that meant was a right to the grantees to amuse themselves; that they were entitled to hook the fish; and that, when they had hooked the fish and brought them to the bank, they were to be handed over to Lord Ebury. With all respect to counsel, I could not follow him at all. I think that that is a kind of idea which would be ridiculed by anyone who knows anything about fishing, and I think that I may say also anybody who knows anything about the law appertaining to this subject. According to my view, what passed by that deed was an exclusive right to fish. When I look at Smith v. Kemp (1) I find this (2 Salk. at p. 637):

"Libera piscaria, which is where the right of fishing is granted to the grantee, and such a grantee hath a property in the fish, and may bring a possessory action for them without making any title."

It seems to me that it cannot be contended that this is only a mere licence; it is a profit à prendre. It is the right to fish in the water, and, when the fish are caught, it is a right to the property in the fish. What has the defendant done? I am not going into the precise things that he has done, because it is admitted that what he has done has lessened the number of the plaintiffs' fish, has interfered with the spawning grounds, and has thereby prevented ova and fry from being deposited as they otherwise would be. It, therefore, curtailed the rights to which, in my opinion, the plaintiffs were entitled. If that is the case, it is perfectly clear to my mind that there is a right of action in the plaintiffs, and that the judgment of the learned judge in the court below, who so held, is perfectly right.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It has been argued in this case that the plaintiffs have nothing more than a licence. I consider that the distinction between a licence and a grant is as plainly marked out as anything in our law; and, if you find a person affecting to grant by deed rights in respect of real property which are capable of being so granted, that is a grant and not a licence. I do not mean to assert that there might not be a deed so particularly worded as to enable you to say that the grant did not mean what it appeared to mean. But a grant by deed creates an incorporeal hereditament, where the subject of the grant is of such a nature as the law allows an incorporeal hereditament to be granted.

I will only read from the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, in Holford v. Bailey (2), one passage. There the question was as to the true point of the distinction between "licence" and "grant"; and the learned judge who gave the judgment of the court says this (13 Q.B. at p. 446):

"To give the plaintiff a sole and exclusive right, even for an hour, a deed was necessary, and that would be a grant; and whether the grantee of a fishery had it in fee, or for a term of years, or even for an hour, he could sue for a disturbance during the time that the interest under his grant continued."

The distinction between "deed" and "grant" is laid down very clearly, but I never heard, and I do not think anybody else ever did before this, of a case in which there was an argument addressed to the court, that what purports to be a grant by deed, there being nothing more than that, warrants it in being considered as a licence. But that same passage also lays down what I conceive to be undoubted law, namely, that the grantee in such a case may sue for a disturbance. A disturbance is a very general phrase. In that case it was held that he might sue in trespass and there were three points raised in the court below: one was, that you could not sue in trespass, but that you must sue on the case. That was met by an argument that the plea could not mean an action on the case. Then there was another point about several fishery, which we do not need to deal with because the decision of the Queen's Bench was overruled in that respect. But the important point was that you could not sue in trespass, and in the Court of Exchequer it was held that you might sue in trespass, and it was not necessary A for them to decide the question whether that might not be a count in case. They said it was not necessary for them to decide it, but they saw no reason to doubt that the Queen's Bench were right there, and I believe they were, because, of course, everything in that count pointed to trespass. But that does not mean that you can only sue in trespass. Quite the contrary. The difficulty was because B the action was in trespass, and, therefore, there was one form of disturbance.

I cannot doubt, on the construction of the grant in the present case, the right of the plaintiffs by virtue of that grant to sue for a wrongful act—a wrongful act which operates as a disturbance of that right, which, indeed, is a very important matter in regard to the infringement of the right. The argument was pushed with the greatest courage to this extent—that, unless you tried to do the very thing C that they were authorised to do, you might destroy the whole subject-matter of the grant, and be liable to no action at all; that the only way in which you might or could do it was by imitating them, or doing something which they are entitled to do under their grant. I never heard any case which gave the slightest colour to such a doctrine at all. I hold that, on the incorporeal hereditament, there is a right of action against any person who disturbs them, either by trespass, or by D nuisance, or in any other substantial manner.

Appeals by the defendants from decisions of GRANTHAM, J.

- B The plaintiff was a manufacturing jeweller who had, for some time, been in the habit of delivering jewellery to one Winter "on sale or return." The prices were always stated on a contract note, which was headed "on sale or return." Early in 1895, the plaintiff delivered certain jewellery to Winter on "sale or return," which Winter shortly after pawned with the respective defendants. In January, 1896, Winter died. He had not paid the plaintiff for any of the jewellery pledged
 C with the defendants, nor had he intimated to the plaintiff that he did not intend to return such jewellery. The plaintiff demanded the return of the jewellery in question from each of the defendants, and the defendants refused to return it unless paid the amount due to them respectively. In actions by the plaintiff against the defendants for trover and conversion of the goods, the learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff in each case. The defendants appealed.

- D Bonsey and Attenborough for the defendant Attenborough.
Bucknill, Q.C., and Attenborough for the defendant Gill.
McCall, Q.C., and W. E. Hume Williams for the plaintiff.

- LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case there was a contract between the plaintiff
 E and Winter, the terms of which were that the goods were delivered to Winter "on sale or return." That is a contract which is so common in business, that it has become well known to the courts, and it has been interpreted. Where a particular kind of contract has become well known, and the courts have determined what is its true construction, all the courts adopt that construction in subsequent cases. The construction which has been put on this contract is, that, if those are the only
 F terms, the contract does not pass the property in the goods at the moment when the contract is made, but at a subsequent time on the happening of certain events. The contract by which goods are delivered "on sale or return" means this: the purchaser may return the goods within a reasonable time, and the option of return belongs solely to the purchaser; the other party cannot even ask for the return of the goods, and his only right is to sue for the price if the goods are not returned.
 G That being the meaning of the contract, we have to see how the party who has the option is to exercise that option.

The rules for determining that question are now put in a code, though they are somewhat unhappily expressed. What has the purchaser to do in order to show that he has accepted the goods, as sold and bought? The Sale of Goods Act, 1891, s. 18, says that

- H "Unless a different intention appears, the following are rules for ascertaining the intention of the parties as to the time at which the property in the goods is to pass to the buyer. . . . Rule 4: When goods are delivered to the buyer on approval or 'on sale or return' or other similar terms the property therein passes to the buyer:—(a) When he signifies his approval or acceptance to the seller or does any other act adopting the transaction."

- I "Acceptance" means acceptance of that part of the contract which makes him the purchaser absolutely. Such acceptance gives the seller the right to be paid, and sue for the price; that is the only right of the seller, and he cannot ask for the return of the goods. The words "does any . . . act adopting the transaction" are difficult to construe. What "transaction" is the buyer to adopt? It cannot be the transaction by which the goods were delivered to him "on sale or return." That transaction had already been adopted. The words must, therefore, mean an adoption of the transaction so as to make the buyer the absolute purchaser of the goods. That will be some act which signifies that he intends to be the absolute purchaser. If he does some act which would be right only if he were the absolute purchaser, that signifies an acceptance or adoption within the statute. A

It has been argued that the buyer must do something which is quite inconsistent with a power to return the goods. That proposition is too wide. The act must be an act which is inconsistent with his not being the absolute purchaser of the goods. If a man has become a buyer under a simple contract of "sale or return," and nothing has been said as to time of payment, the price must be paid within a reasonable time. That is a transaction on credit. In this case, an act was done by the man who was in possession of the goods under a contract of "sale or return"; he pawned the goods. He had not then the power of returning the goods, unless he repaid the amount advanced by the pawnee. That is inconsistent with his free power to return the goods. He ought not so to deal with the goods unless he means to treat himself as being the absolute purchaser. The evident conclusion is that he has treated himself as the absolute purchaser. On the terms of the section we must hold that, by doing such an act, the buyer became the absolute purchaser, and the property in the goods passed. The only right of the seller was to sue for the price. The decision of GRANTHAM, J., cannot be supported, and the appeals must be allowed. B C D

LOPES, L.J.—The important question in this case is, what is the meaning of the contract under which goods are delivered "on sale or return"? The position of a person to whom goods have been delivered on a contract of "sale or return" is this: He has an option of becoming the absolute purchaser of the goods, and may become the absolute purchaser in three ways. He may buy them at the price fixed; he may retain them so long as to make it unreasonable to return them; or he may do something inconsistent with a return of the goods, that is, with his being other than the absolute purchaser of the goods. That is the meaning of the contract of "sale or return." The words of s. 18 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, are difficult to construe. [His LORDSHIP read s. 18, r. 4, and continued:] I think that, if he retains the goods for an unreasonable time, he does something which is inconsistent with a return of the goods. Again, if he does an act which is inconsistent with a return, as, for instance, if he sells the goods, that is an act "adopting the transaction," and the property passes. Again, if he pawns the goods, he adopts the transaction, because he has not then the free control over the goods so as to be able to return them. In all these cases, he comes within the words of the section, as having done an act "adopting the transaction," and the property in the goods passes. If that is the true construction of the section, it is perfectly clear that the defendants are entitled to retain the goods, because they have been pawned to them. An act has been done which is inconsistent with a return of the goods, and, therefore, the property in the goods passed to Winter, and, therefore, to the defendants. The decision of GRANTHAM, J., was erroneous, and these appeals must be allowed. E F G H

Administration of Estates—Real estate—Devise—Building contracts entered into by testator—Contracts not completed at time of death—Right of devisee to performance of contract at expense of estate.

By his will the testator devised real estate to E.L.S. for life with remainders over and gave his household furniture and farm stock to her absolutely and the use of other land for a year after his death. Before his death the testator had entered into contracts, binding on him at his death, for the building of farm premises and cottages on the land given to E.L.S. for life, on that the use of which was given her for one year, and on other land which he had bought in his lifetime and had conveyed as a gift to the use of E.L.S. for life with remainder to her daughter M. At the testator's death these contracts were not completed and his executors stopped completion but settled claims with the builders.

Held: E.L.S. was entitled to have the cottages contracted to be built on the land given to her for life completed at the cost of the testator's estate, but had no claim in respect of the contracts to build on the land conveyed to her before the testator's death.

Adjourned Summons by the defendants in an administration action for additional inquiries to determine (inter alia) whether the testator had at the time of his death entered into any and what building contracts remained uncompleted, and whether his estate was under any liability therefrom, and what sums of money would have to be provided to have such contracts completed.

By his will, dated June 2, 1893, the testator appointed his sons and H. J. Sprake executors and gave E. L. Sprake Day absolutely his household furniture and effects and his live and dead farming stock; and devised his freehold house called Weston Manor House, with forty-three acres of land, to the use of E. L. Sprake Day for life, with remainder to Alice Maud Day, with remainders over. He also gave her the use of other lands for a year after his death, and he gave his residuary real and personal estate to his sons upon trust to raise and pay certain legacies, and subject thereto upon trust in moieties for his two sons for their respective lives with remainders over.

The testator died on Nov. 9, 1893, entitled to a considerable real and personal estate. On Nov. 10, 1893, the action was commenced for the administration of the real and personal estate of the testator by the plaintiffs who were the sons of the testator. The defendants were H. J. Sprake Day and A. M. Day. In July, 1896, an administration order was made directing the usual inquiries. On May 29 and June 1, 1893, the testator had entered into building contracts for the erection of a new farm and dairy house, at the price of £859, on the land the use of which was given by the will to E. L. Sprake Day for one year; for the erection on part of the land devised by the will to E. L. Sprake Day for life, of two new cottages at a price of £400; for the erection on land at Misterton, which had been purchased by the testator, and by his direction conveyed to the use of E. L. Sprake Day and A. M. Day for their joint lives, with remainder to A. M. Day absolutely of four cottages and a washhouse, at an aggregate price of £1,369. These contracts were at the date of the testator's death uncompleted and binding as between the testator and the builders with whom they were made. The plaintiffs had stopped the completion of the contracts and settled the claims of the builders.

NORTH, J.—As regards the property which was devised by the testator for the benefit of E. L. Sprake Day, and which was the subject of a contract for building existing at the time of his death, I think a case is made for an inquiry, because it seems to me that Cooper v. Jarman (1) applies. It is said that that case stands by itself; but although, as far as I know, there has been no other case which supports it, on the other hand, there is none against it, and it lays down an intelligible principle. It has been unreversed for a great many years, and though no doubt the point is one which does not often arise, still there the case stands, and I must follow it. But I do not think it applies to the Misterton property which was not given by the testator's will. That property had, at some time before his death been conveyed direct to E. L. Sprake Day at his instance. Then the testator entered into a contract for the building of four cottages upon this land. This contract has not been completed, but the person entitled to the benefit of it has carried in a claim against the testator's estate, and it appears from the chief clerk's note that a certain sum has been allowed.

I do not see that any claim has been made out by E. L. Sprake Day in respect of this property. The property was conveyed to her out and out; and the testator entered into some contract with respect to it, but whether under such circumstances that she could have compelled him to carry out the contract I do not know. I can understand that there might be circumstances under which he would have been bound to carry out such a contract, by reason of some consideration moving from her to him to induce him to undertake the liability. But the evidence which has been adduced does not establish any liability of that kind, and I do not see how a person who for this purpose is a stranger to the owner of the property before the testator's death and not taking under his will, can claim to have a contract entered into by the testator with a builder to erect houses upon it carried out. Under these circumstances I can only direct an inquiry whether the testator had entered into any, and what building contracts or contract affecting the property devised to E. L. Sprake Day for her life, with remainders over, and whether any and which of such contracts were uncompleted at his death in respect of which his estate was under any and what liability, and whether any and what compensation should be paid by the testator's estate in respect thereof.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (North, J.), February 12, 1896]

[Reported 74 L.T. 50]

Trust—Investment—Power to invest in specified securities—Estate consisting of securities not within power—Postponement of sale—Concurrence of trustees.

By his will the testator gave his residuary estate to trustees on trust to convert and invest the proceeds in their names in the public stocks, funds, or securities of Great Britain or of any foreign or colonial government, and they were empowered to postpone for such time as should seem expedient the sale, conversion, or getting in of any part of the trust estate. The testator's estate consisted chiefly of foreign stocks and bonds, some of which were payable to bearer. These investments were retained by the trustees for some years; then one trustee considered it best to convert, but the majority favoured further postponement.

Held: under the direction to invest the trustees had no power to purchase foreign bonds payable to bearer, but they had power, at the discretion and with the concurrence of all the trustees, to postpone the sale of investments of that character held by the testator at his death; there being one trustee objecting, the trustees must convert.

Summons by one of four trustees to determine whether certain investments were authorised by the will; whether the trustees could retain certain investments forming part of the testator's estate which were not authorised for investments made by the trustees; and whether specified securities ought to be retained.

By his will, dated Mar. 18, 1890, the testator, Mathias Roth, after making certain pecuniary bequests, gave all the residue of his real and personal estate to his wife and three other trustees upon trust to permit his wife to have the use and enjoyment during her life of his furniture and of all the income of his property less an annuity thereafter given, and upon further trust to sell his real estate, and receive, convert, and get in all moneys and effects which might be owing to or belong to him; and upon further trust to lay out and invest all moneys which might come to their hands under or by virtue of the will in the names of his wife, Emil Roth, John Thomas Campbell, and Rudolph Goldberger, or other the trustees or trustee for the time being of the will, in or upon any of the public stocks, funds, or securities of Great Britain or of any foreign or Colonial government or state to be approved of by his trustees or trustee or in or upon any real or leasehold securities in England or Wales. The trust fund was directed to be held in trust for the wife for life with remainder in equal shares for the testator's two daughters for life with remainder to their respective children, and the will provided that the trustees or trustee should have a discretionary power to postpone for such period as should seem expedient the sale, conversion, or getting in of any part of the trust estate.

The testator died on Oct. 19, 1891. At the time of his death the greater part of his property consisted of foreign stocks and bonds, some of which were payable to bearer. Some of these securities were retained by the trustees until the autumn of 1894, when the applicant, Goldberger, one of the trustees, raised the question that they ought to be converted; the other three trustees wished to retain them. A

Upjohn for the applicant trustee.

Fellows for the other three trustees.

Gore Browne for the testator's daughters. B

Capron for other beneficiaries.

NORTH, J.—All I can do is to declare the construction of this clause in the will. I am not in a position to give definite advice to the trustees as to particular securities. [His LORDSHIP read from the will the trust to pay all income to the testator's wife, the direction to convert and the power to postpone, and continued:]—So long as the trustees all think fit unanimously to retain the property in the state in which the testator left it and pay the income to the widow, in my opinion, they have power to do so. So far as they have gone they have acted within their powers. But the discretion to postpone, which the will gives, is a discretion of all the trustees. It is not a case in which the majority have any right to bind the minority. If they cannot all agree to retain the securities, they must be converted in the ordinary way under the trust for conversion. Then the power is to retain so long as expedient. They must exercise the discretion continually. It is not, in my opinion, within their powers to fix a time for retaining the investments, to pass a resolution for example that they will not realise the securities for five years. That must not be pressed too far. I do not say that they might not agree among themselves to postpone calling in a particular debt for six months. But as a rule they cannot fix a definite time for retaining the securities. If at any time they cannot agree to go on retaining they must convert. It is said to be hard that one trustee should overrule the other three, but there is nothing in the will about a majority, and the argument would apparently enable a bare majority of the trustees by a single resolution to put an end to the exercise of any discretion for the future. C
F

A different question is raised as to some of these securities which are payable to bearer. I think there is nothing in the will to limit the trustees' discretion as to postponement to securities which are not payable to bearer. The circumstance that some securities are payable to bearer and, therefore, attended by a certain risk is one which the trustees are bound to take into account, but if they think fit to retain them they are not prohibited from doing so. But as to investment by the trustees I do not think these securities are within their power. The direction in the will is explicit. The investments are to be made in the names or name of the trustees or trustee. It is said that they may invest not in their names at all, but in securities which are payable to bearer, and satisfy the direction by keeping them at a bank or elsewhere in their joint names. I am of opinion they cannot. If such securities were intended there is a well known form of direction to trustees to invest in their names or under their legal control, and the testator has not used it. It is said that many of the securities named in the will are only payable to bearer, and that to exclude them is to strike out a great part of the power. I do not see the difficulty. As I read the power it is a power to invest in such of the securities named as could be purchased in the names of the trustees. The order should expressly state that the court does not express any opinion as to retaining or realising any particular investments. G

Power of Appointment—Fraud on power—Appointment of life interest in trust determinable if appointee became Roman Catholic or member of sisterhood—Gift over on determination of life interest—Avoidance of gift for remoteness.

By a marriage settlement, made in 1847, the wife's real and personal property was settled (inter alia) on trust for herself for life, with remainder to the children or other issue of the marriage as the wife should by deed, will or codicil appoint. There were three daughters issue of the marriage. After the death of her husband, the widow, in April, 1890, by deed appointed, in exercise of the power, that the trust premises should after her death be held by the trustees as to one equal third part in trust for her daughter T. M.; as to one other equal third part, in trust for her daughter J.; and as to the remaining one equal third part, on trust to pay the income thereof to her daughter H. E., if not at the date of the widow's death a member of the Roman Catholic Church or of any sisterhood, during her life or until she should become a member of the Roman Catholic Church or of any sisterhood, without power of anticipation during any coverture, and subject as aforesaid, as to the capital and income thereof, for the said T. M. and J. in equal shares. The widow died in 1893. H. E. became a member of a sisterhood in 1895.

Held: (i) the appointment of one equal third part of the trust premises on trust to pay the income thereof to H. E. during her life or until she should become a member of the Roman Catholic Church or of any sisterhood was not a fraud on the power.

Action for a declaration whether the trust contained in a deed of appointment by Tryphosa Sutton, deceased, dated April 19, 1890, supplemental to an indenture of settlement, dated April 13, 1847, for payment of the income of one equal third part of the trust premises subject to the settlement to the defendant Harriet Ellin Sutton, had determined, and if so, from what date it had determined, and for other relief. The plaintiffs, James Gadesden Wainwright and William Wainwright, sued as trustees of the settlement. The defendants were Tryphosa Mary Miller (wife of Edward Miller), Jane Sutton (spinster) and Harriet Ellin Sutton (spinster).

By an indenture, dated April 13, 1847, made between John Sutton of the first part, Tryphosa Sutton (then Tryphosa Wainwright, spinster) of the second part, and George Johnson Wainwright and William Wainwright (both since deceased) of the third part (being a settlement made on the marriage afterwards solemnised between John Sutton and Tryphosa Wainwright), Tryphosa Wainwright, in consideration of the then intended marriage, and with the consent of John Sutton, conveyed all the real property to which she was entitled to G. J. Wainwright and W. Wainwright, on trust, after the solemnisation of the marriage, to pay the income of the real property to Tryphosa Wainwright, or Sutton, for her life, and, after her decease, on trust for the children or other issue of the marriage (such issue to be born in the lifetime of Tryphosa Wainwright), at such ages, days, or times, for such estates or interests, and if more than one in such shares and proportions, and with, under, and subject to such powers, provisoes, conditions, and limitations, and in such manner as Tryphosa Wainwright, notwithstanding coverture, should by deed, with or without power of revocation or by will or codicil appoint, and in default of such appointment in trust for all the children of the marriage, and their respective heirs and assigns, if more than one, in equal shares as tenants in common. By the same indenture Tryphosa Wainwright assigned all her personal estate to G. J. Wainwright and W. Wainwright to be held by them on the same trusts, intents, and purposes, and with, under, or subject to the same powers, provisos, and declarations as the real estate, or as near thereto as the different natures of the estates and the rules of law and equity would admit. The marriage was duly solemnised. John Sutton died on July 22, 1868, and G. J. Wainwright on Sept. 5, 1869.

By an indenture dated Jan. 11, 1883, the plaintiffs, James Gadesden Wainwright and William Wainwright the younger, were appointed trustees of the marriage settlement jointly with William Wainwright the elder, and the trust premises were duly vested in the plaintiffs and William Wainwright the elder. William Wainwright the elder died on Feb. 5, 1888. There were three daughters, issue of the marriage, namely, the defendants, Tryphosa Mary Miller, Jane Sutton, and Harriet Ellin Sutton. By a deed-poll, dated April 19, 1890, Tryphosa Sutton, widow, in exercise of the power appointed given by the settlement, and of every or any other power in anywise enabling her in that behalf, appointed that the trust premises should after her death be held by the trustees or trustee for the time being thereof, as follows, namely :

“As to one equal third part thereof in trust for the said Tryphosa Mary Miller, as to one other equal third part thereof in trust for the said Jane Sutton, and as to the remaining one equal third part thereof upon trust to pay the said income thereof to the said Harriet Ellin Sutton, if not at my death a member of the Roman Catholic Church, or of any sisterhood, during her life, or until

A she shall become a member of the Roman Catholic Church, or of any sisterhood, without power of anticipation during any coverture, and subject as aforesaid, as to the capital and income thereof for the said Tryphosa Mary Miller and Jane Sutton in equal shares."

The deed-poll contained a power of revocation which was not exercised.

B The widow Tryphosa Sutton died on Oct. 7, 1893, and since her death the income of the trust property had been paid to the defendants, Tryphosa Mary Miller, Jane Sutton, and Harriet Ellin Sutton, in equal shares. The defendant Harriet Ellin Sutton became a member of a sisterhood in July, 1895. The trustees of the marriage settlement of April 13, 1847, commenced this action on April 13, 1896.

C For the defendant Harriet Ellin Sutton it was contended, on the authority of D'Abbadia v. Bizoin (1), that the appointment of April 19, 1890, was void as being a fraud on the power since the appointor, Mrs. Sutton, had thereby attempted to give effect to her prejudice against the Roman Catholic Church which was an indirect purpose not warranted by the power. Further, on the authority of Hodgson v. Halford (2) the gift over to Tryphosa Mary Miller and Jane Sutton was void for remoteness because there was no certainty that it would vest within twenty-one years of the death of the appointor who was the only one of the parties concerned who was alive at the date of the settlement creating the power.

Vaughan Hawkins for the plaintiffs.

J. G. Wood for the defendant Harriet Ellin Sutton.

Dibdin (Eve, Q.C., with him) for the other defendants.

E BYRNE, J.—Two points have been taken in behalf of Harriet Sutton. One point is this. It is said that it is a fraud on the power to appoint in this form; and D'Abbadie v. Bizoin (1) has been cited in support of that view. On the other hand, it is admitted that Hodgson v. Halford (2), before HALL, V.-C., is an authority which is indistinguishable in principle from the present case. It is said that the general rule laid down by the Vice-Chancellor in that case is too broadly expressed.

F Whether that be so or not, the case in question is one which, in its facts, comes so closely to the present that the principle applied in that case must apply in the one I have before me. I am asked to say that it is inconsistent with the authority of D'Abbadie v. Bizoin (1), which was cited before HALL, V.-C., in Hodgson v. Halford (2), although the Vice-Chancellor does not expressly deal with it in his judgment. It is sufficient for me to say that the circumstances in D'Abbadie v. Bizoin (1) were very much more removed from the circumstances in the present case than the circumstances in Hodgson v. Halford (2), and I consider that the latter is an authority binding on me. Accordingly, I hold that this is not a case of fraud on the power. On that point the contention fails.

G Then a second point is raised. It is said that the appointment is void on the ground of remoteness. It is said that the appointment of one equal third part to pay the income to Harriet Sutton, who was not alive at the time when the deed of settlement creating the power of appointment was made, being given to her in the first place on the condition that she is not a member of the Roman Catholic Church; and, secondly, on the condition that she should not become a member of a sisterhood, is void, because it is said the event of entering a sisterhood might not happen within a life in being at the date of the settlement, or within twenty-one years afterwards. I am of opinion that the gift is not void for remoteness. In the first place I would refer to what was decided by MALINS, V.-C., in Stuart v. Cockerell (4), and afterwards referred to in Evans v. Walker (5), where the Vice-Chancellor says (3 Ch.D. at p. 213):

"The first point is, whether the gift to the nephew and two nieces of the testator is void for remoteness, and it is quite clear to my mind that it is not, because there is no objection to a gift to unborn children for life, and then to an ascertained person, providing the vesting is not postponed. That point I commented upon in Stuart v. Cockerell (4).” A

The point so far is conceded by counsel on behalf of Harriet Sutton; but it is said that the uncertainty introduced by reason of the estate for life given to Harriet Sutton being made determinable upon the entering into a sisterhood, or becoming a member of the Roman Catholic Church, is such as to render the gift void, which, if the estate were not thus limited, would be perfectly good. B

It appears to me, in the first place, that Hodgson v. Halford (2) is not an authority in favour of Harriet Sutton on this point, and, among other things for this reason, which alone would be quite sufficient; that, in that case, the persons to take were not to be ascertained till after the happening of the event. It is clear in the present case that, if this were a gift to her for her life, and subject thereto, the capital and income were to go to the persons named, it would be perfectly good. C It is suggested that a contingency is introduced or an uncertainty of the event on which the person to take will take, because of this frame of limitation. In my opinion the gift is a gift of one estate to Harriet Sutton, and just as much a gift of one estate as if it were a gift to her for life. It is true that the estate may be determined prior to her death on the happening of a certain event. This, also, I think, is clear, that the gift in favour of Tryphosa Mary Miller and Jane Sutton is a vested gift; and there is no uncertainty in the persons who are to take on the determination of the prior estate. D

Two or three cases have been referred to, and I will first mention one as showing the opinion of KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., when Vice-Chancellor, upon this matter, although it was not necessary in the circumstances of that case for him to decide the point. I refer to Boughton v. James (3), where the Vice-Chancellor says this (1 Coll. at p. 46): E

“Undoubtedly, as estates in fee may be well given, so life interests may be well given by will to the children of a living person, who is a bachelor at the testator’s death. But, as an estate in fee, to be devised validly must be so devised as to vest within the compass of lives in being at the testator’s death, and twenty-one years after the death of the survivor of them, so I conceive must a life interest. That it is limited in this duration can, I apprehend, make no difference. It may be true that a life estate, devised to a person not in existence at a testator’s death, may be made by his will to cease before its natural termination at any time or upon any event, but that is a very different question”; F

by which the learned judge means a very different question from that which he had to determine in the case before him. I read that as meaning that his Lordship thought that, just as estates in fee might be given, so life estates might be given, and that life estates might be given, although made to cease before the natural determination, at any time or in any event. H

I was also referred to a passage in LEWIS ON THE LAW OF PERPETUITY (1843) at p. 173, where the learned author says:

“The remoteness against which the rule for prevention of perpetuities is directed, is remoteness in the commencement, or first taking effect of limitations, and not in the cesser or determination of them. An estate that is to arise within the prescribed period may be so limited as to determine on the happening of any event, however remote, as, for example, the indefinite failure of issue of a person; which we shall presently see is too remote a contingency for the commencement of limitation. But an estate can only be made to determine upon an event thus remote, when, by its original form and limitation, it will regularly cease by the happening of the contingency as the term of the duration of the estate; for, as will hereafter be seen, a power reserved to a person to determine the limitation on such remote event would be void.” I

A That is a direct statement of the view of the learned author which is in accordance with the view taken by KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., and I think it is correctly stated. I have now dealt with all the points that have been raised, and the result is that I hold, in the first place, that there is no fraud on the power; and, secondly, that the gift over in this case is good, and, upon the admissions made by the parties, has taken effect.

In exercise of a power of appointment given to her by a marriage settlement, Mrs. Saunders made three several appointments by deed in favour of her son, E. G. Saunders. All the appointments were in the same form, and by the first she appointed B

“that so much of the stock, funds, shares, and securities now held by the present trustees of the said indenture of settlement upon and subject to the trusts thereof as shall be sufficient to raise the net sum of £2,000 shall, subject to the life interest therein of the said Ellen Anne Saunders, henceforth belong and be vested in the said Edward George Saunders, and be held in trust for him, the said Edward George Saunders, his executors, administrators, and assigns.” C

A question was raised whether E. G. Saunders was entitled to the sum appointed free of duty, as well as of all expenses of raising it. STIRLING, J., held that the duty must be paid out of the £2,000 and from that decision E. G. Saunders appealed. D

SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R. The question in this case turns upon the construction of a deed appointing a certain fund which was the subject of the trusts of a marriage settlement. In the events which have happened those funds were vested in trustees upon trust for Mrs. Saunders for life, and subject to her life interest upon such trusts for the children of the marriage as she should by deed or will appoint. She made various appointments by deed, three of which at all events were in the same form, and I will deal with one of them. Mrs. Saunders appointed F

“that so much of the stock, funds, shares, and securities now held by the present trustees of the said indenture of settlement upon and subject to the trusts thereof as shall be sufficient to raise the net sum of £2,000 shall, subject to the life interest of the said Ellen Anne Saunders, henceforth belong and be vested in Edward George Saunders, and be held in trust for him, the said Edward George Saunders, his executors, administrators, and assigns.” G

E. G. Saunders was one of her sons.

The question is: What is the effect of the expression “the net sum of £2,000” in that particular document? The controversy relates to duties which are somewhat heavy, and the learned judge in the court below has construed this appointment in this way: He said ([1897] 1 Ch. at p. 892): H

“Applying [the reasoning of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., in Banks v. Braithwaite] to the present case, what is given here is not the net sum of £2,000, but so much of the stock as will be sufficient to raise the net sum of £2,000; and when that is ascertained by the proper calculation, as the Vice-Chancellor says, that particular sum of stock is to belong to the appointee. In my opinion, the present case falls within Banks v. Braithwaite (1), and the appointment does not carry with it the succession duty and the appointee takes subject thereto.” I

It appears to me that what is given to Mr. E. G. Saunders in this case is the net sum of £2,000 in stocks. I cannot follow in this deed the distinction between the measure of the sum and the sum itself. We are discussing simply a question of

A amount, and bearing that in mind it appears to me that the true meaning and true intent of these words is that this is an appointment of a net sum of £2,000 in a particular form. If that is the true construction, how can it be held that any expenses are to come out of this net sum of £2,000? The net sum which is here given is not to be subject to deduction. That is as I understand it. There were other appointments in the same form, and then the last appointment (which I will call the residuary appointment) appears to have been subject to certain preceding appointments. That is how I read the appointment apart from all authority, and I cannot regard it as a gift of so much stock as would be sufficient to raise the sum of £2,000 to be given to George, without seeing that the intention is to give him that net amount. If I could arrive at any other conclusion, viz., that it was a gift of so much of what is called the measure of the £2,000, and the net sum was not to be given to him, the case might be different. But this is not the least like instructions to a broker. You have to look at the document and the object of the document; it has nothing to do with what you are to do with the net sum when you have got it. This is a gift by appointment by a mother to her son, and the question is, what has she given?

D I am not going through the authorities, but, with reference to Banks v. Braithwaite (1), which was so much pressed upon STIRLING, J., and in deference to which he gave this decision, I confess I should not have construed that document as KINDERSLEY, V.-C., did. In that case, a testator gave the residue of his personal estate to trustees, upon trust to set apart £10,000 Consols, and pay the dividends to his sister for life, and after her decease to retain so much of the said sum of £10,000 as should be sufficient to realise the clear yearly income of £150; and he directed the trustees to pay the dividends and other income of the stock so directed to be retained by them to his nephew. I should have read that as a gift of a clear yearly income of £150 to the nephew. However, I see the difference between that case and this, because there there was a difficulty in working out the principle which I should have endeavoured to apply to it with regard to certain rates and duties, and so on. Here we are not embarrassed by that at all. This is a simple appointment to Edward George Saunders of this sum. It appears to me, on the true construction of this document, that Banks v. Braithwaite (1) and other cases like it do not apply. Of course there is a difference between a legacy and an appointed fund. In the case of legacies the rule is that the costs come out of residue unless the contrary intention is expressed; and, in the case of a legacy, when you get the word "clear" or "net" there is nothing to which it can apply except the duties, for the expenses come out of the residue. That reasoning does not apply to an appointed fund. When you ask me what the meaning is of "clear" or "net" when applied to an appointed fund, I think prima facie it means what it says—clear of everything. There may be reasons for not giving effect to it, there may be difficulties about various rates and duties, and all sorts of things. Here there is no difficulty at all. I cannot see any justification for saying that the "net sum" here means clear of the expense of raising it, but subject to something else. The appeal, therefore, must be allowed, and, with regard to costs in this particular case, it appears to me that the costs must come out of the last appointed fund. That is the only view I can take of this series of documents.

I CHITTY, L.J.—I agree. It is a question of the construction of the deed of appointment under a special power.

With regard to legacies, the authorities have settled that where a legacy is given to one person, so that only one rate of duty is payable, the legacy given is of a clear sum of money, the legatee takes free of duty. It is sufficient to refer to Haynes v. Haynes (2) for that proposition. There is undoubtedly some distinction between a legacy and a portion of a fund subject to a power of appointment. A legatee bears none of the expense of raising his legacy; that all falls on the general estate, and the legatee is entitled, where it is a legacy of £1,000, to his £1,000. In order to free him from the legacy duty, however, there must be words which show that intention, and the word which has been relied on is the word "clear." I can make no distinction between the words that occur here, "net sum," and the words "clear sum." In the case of an appointment where there are no words of expression to the contrary, all the appointees have to bear rateably, according to the general rule, the expenses of the trustees of administering the fund, including the distribution. It might be said that the word "clear" or the word "net" in this instrument refers to those expenses only. I think it would be a very narrow construction. That is not the construction that was adopted by KAY, J., in Re Currie (3), where there was an appointment under a general power of appointment of so much of the trust funds as should be of the clear value of £1,000, and he held, and I agree with his reasoning, that that was an appointment of a sum of £1,000 clear of all the trustees' expenses, and clear also of the legacy or succession duty. I should say there is no distinction between legacy and succession duty in a case such as the present. That being so, I refer to the words that the appointor has used.

The appointment is not of a sum of money to be raised by the trustees by sale, it is an appointment of a portion of the trust funds. The trust funds, according to the statements agreed to at the Bar, were invested in ordinary trust investments, and liable to be changed from time to time under a power to vary securities. It is a portion of the trust fund thus invested that the appointor disposes of. You are to ascertain (by reading the words) what the portion is, and that portion is itself given to the appointee. It appears to me, on the true reading of this deed, that in ascertaining what portion is appointed you must, in accordance with the language used by the appointor, clear the portion from all charges, including succession duty. The words are: So much of the stock, etc. "as shall be sufficient to raise the net sum of £2,000." That net sum of £2,000 is to be arrived at by excluding from the £2,000 the trustees' expenses, and I think also succession duty. The case is not the same as that by which STIRLING, J., considered himself bound, namely, Banks v. Braithwaite (1). Observations have already been made by the Master of the Rolls on that case, and I must confess that I also should have arrived on the construction of that will at a different conclusion. The fund there of Consols was set apart for one purpose, and one purpose only, namely, for the benefit of the annuitant, and subject to that the fund that was to be returned in Consols was to go to the residuary legatee. The direction was to retain a sum of Consols sufficient to realise the clear yearly income of £150, and then the trustees were directed to pay the dividends on that sum to the annuitant in the manner mentioned in the will. I think the whole object of the testator there was to provide a clear yearly income of £150. I understand the reasoning of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., but I think it is too fine, if I may say so, to make it applicable to that case. Of course, the Consols may have been converted, and the rate of interest payable on the Consols might by Act of Parliament have been subsequently reduced. It is, as I have said, a question of construction, and I think that this case is not governed by Banks v. Braithwaite (1), and that the true construction is that this appointed portion of the trust funds was clear of all charges, and not merely of the expenses of the trustees.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question in this case is a question of the construction of words appearing in a particular appointment. The Master of the Rolls and CHITTY, L.J., have already expressed very clear views as to what ought to be the construction of these words in the particular appointment. I cannot say that I am by any means as clear as they are as to what is the proper construction of the words appearing in this appointment; but, having regard to the fact that this is merely a question of the construction of the particular words in a particular document, I am not prepared to differ from that construction merely because I hesitate about that which to them seems clear. However I do wish to say a few words as to the difficulty that occurs to my mind in the construction of this document. The words of the document are these:

"That so much of the stock, funds, shares, and securities now held by the present trustees of the said indenture of settlement upon and subject to the trusts thereof as shall be sufficient to raise the net sum of £2,000 shall, subject to the life interest therein of the said Ellen Anne Saunders, henceforth belong and be vested in the said Edward George Saunders, and be held in trust for him, the said Edward George Saunders, his executors, administrators, and assigns."

The question to my mind that has to be answered on the construction of this document is this: Ought the word "net" to be annexed to the gift, or what I agree is precisely the same thing, to the measure of the gift; or ought that word "net" to be annexed not to the gift or measure of the gift, but to the raising of the sum? Is the word "net" to be treated as qualifying the quantity of stock with which the trustees were to deal; or is the word "net" to be read here as annexed to the gift to Edward George Saunders?

Various authorities have been cited, but it seems to me that in this case, as indeed in every case, it is a dangerous thing to lay down any general rule as to the meaning of words of this sort. You must look always at the whole document and ascertain what the meaning of the words is when you have taken the whole document into consideration. It is not safe to say there are authorities which decide that a "clear gift" means in the case of a legacy a gift clear of legacy duty. No doubt, very often—and you may go beyond very often and say generally—in wills where there is a legacy given by such words, such would be the meaning of the word "clear," because there is nothing else which the gift in the nature of things can be clear of, and unless you give that meaning to the word "clear," you give no meaning to it at all. But even in the case of a legacy, it is not quite true to say that it is universally so, for I take it that, in the case of a legacy, if the word "clear" is used it might very well be that you might find in the nature of the gift something to indicate that the word was not meant there to import clear of legacy duty; as, for instance, if the gift in question was an annuity given to a series of annuitants in succession. But in the present case the question arises at an earlier stage.

The question in the present case, to my mind, is precisely the question which KINDERSLEY, V.-C., propounded to himself in Banks v. Braithwaite (1), and which STIRLING, J., propounded to himself in the present case; that is, is the word "net" here to be annexed to the gift or is the word "net" here to be applied simply to the duty which the trustees had to perform? Is it here to be construed merely as qualifying the subject-matter with which the trustees were to deal as distinguished from the quantum of the gift? One can quite understand that very often you may get a collocation of words which would make it plain that the word "net" or "clear" is meant to qualify the gift, is meant to be annexed to the gift, as in a case where you have the two words "raise" and "pay" placed in immediate collocation. If the will or appointment says you are to raise and pay the clear sum of so much I think it would be plain in such a case that this quality of clear of deduction is to apply not only to the sum to be raised but also to the sum to be handed over or given to the donee. In the present case you have not got any word as clear as that, because so far as the English grammar is concerned the word "net" seems to me to be limited in its application to the sum to be raised, or rather to the amount of Consols to be handed over, and not, as far as grammatical collocation is concerned, to apply to the amount which is to be transferred.

Having said this because I have a very strong feeling as to the danger of deciding the meaning of particular words in a particular document by laying down any rule of universal application, I prefer to say that, as far as my judgment is concerned, I concur in the decision of the court because I am not prepared to say that, having regard to the words of this particular document, the construction which the Master of the Rolls and CURRY, L.J., think is the right construction is not the right construction. These documents are very generally drawn by professional men, but of course occasionally they are drawn by laymen, and I do think that it is always a dangerous thing to conclude the construction of words in a particular document which may be under consideration by decisions that have been arrived at on similar words in other cases.

DARTFORD RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. BEXLEY HEATH RAIL. CO.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Halsbury, L.C., Lord Watson, Lord Herschell, Lord Maenaghten, Lord Morris, Lord Shand and Lord Davey), December 2, 3, 1897]

Bridge—Railway—Line crossing footpath—Obligation of railway company to construct bridge to carry line or footpath—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict., c. 20), s. 46.

Section 46 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, held not to impose upon a railway company whose line crossed a public footpath any obligation to carry the railway over the footpath or the footpath over the railway by means of a bridge.

Notes. Referred to: Glasgow and South Western Rail. Co. v. Ayr Corpn., [1912] A.C. 520.

As to the construction of bridges by a railway company, see 31 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 588 et seq.; and for cases see 38 DIGEST (Repl.) 306 et seq. For the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 46, see 19 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 616.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., A. L. SMITH and RIGBY, L.JJ.), reported [1896] 2 Q.B. 74, discharging an order of the Divisional Court (DAY and LAWRENCE, JJ.).

In 1883 the respondents, the Bexley Heath Rail. Co., obtained an Act of Parliament authorising the construction of the railway, and its powers and provisions were amended and enlarged by subsequent Acts. These Acts incorporated the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. In the construction of the railway the respondents carried the line on an embankment across a public footpath in the parish of Crayford. In February, 1895, the parish council of Crayford passed a resolution calling on the appellants, under the Local Government Act, 1894, to assert the right of the inhabitants in regard to the footpath so obstructed, and they took action accordingly.

The Divisional Court made an order directing that a writ of mandamus should issue commanding the respondents to carry their railway over the footpath or the footpath over the railway by means of a bridge. The Court of Appeal reversed their decision and discharged the rule for the writ with costs.

By the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 46 :

“If the line of the railway cross any turnpike road or public highway, then (except where otherwise provided by the special Act) either such road shall be carried over the railway, or the railway shall be carried over such road, by means of a bridge, of the height and width and with the ascent or descent by this or the special Act in that behalf provided: and such bridge, with the immediate approaches, and all other necessary works connected therewith, shall be executed and at all times thereafter maintained at the expense of the company: Provided always, that, with the consent of two or more justices in petty sessions, as after mentioned, it shall be lawful for that company to carry the railway across any highway, other than a public carriage road, on the level.”

Macmorran, Q.C., and Hohler for the appellants.

Farwell, Q.C., and Boyle for the respondents were not called on to address the House.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I regret, with A. L. SMITH, L.J., that we do not know the grounds on which this order was made by the Queen's Bench Division. I confess for myself I do not understand why the mandamus was issued. It is not the fault of the learned counsel for the appellants, who have both argued very ably and earnestly in favour of their proposition, but I am bound to say that I do not yet understand where the obligation to build the bridge comes from. I cannot find it in the Act of Parliament. All that I can conjecture to be the reasoning is this: Finding that the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, certainly does not in terms contain any such obligation, you find in s. 46 a proviso which, unless there is such an obligation there, would, it is said, be an unreasonable proviso to put into the Act, because there is no such obligation in the statute, and by the hypothesis the proviso can only operate where there is such an obligation. I think that is stating fairly the argument which has been presented to your Lordships. But that argument assumes that the statute is the final end of legislation: and that is exactly what it is not, because the statute in its terms assumes that special Acts will be passed from time to time containing provisions of their own, and if there are some such provisions, as has been pointed out by the learned counsel, then the proviso has its natural and just operation. The whole argument is, that you must try the statute by itself and the proviso by itself and assume that there must be an obligation (which certainly in terms is not there), because, as they say, if you were to construe the whole statute there is the proviso, and it must operate on something, and, inasmuch as, if the obligation is not there the proviso operates upon nothing, it is an unreasonable course of legislation of which you cannot assume that the legislature would have been guilty.

It seems to me that I have already given the only answer which can be given, and it seems to be a complete answer, namely, that this is not the end of the legislation according to the statute itself, on the contrary, both by the form of the preamble and by the title of the statute it purports to be an Act of Parliament which contains within itself all such general provisions as are applicable to railways and are to be included, or are usually included, in every special Act. That appears to me to be the whole point, and although your Lordships have been engaged for a considerable period of time in the argument over this matter, it seems to resolve itself into this. I asked the question which each of the learned lords justices asked in turn without getting an answer. Where am I to find either in this special Act or in the general Act the obligation to build a bridge over a footpath? I cannot find it. Except in the proviso, with which I have already dealt, there is no such obligation to be found there, and there being no such obligation to be found no mandamus can be issued to command the railway company to do that which they are not bound to do under these Acts of Parliament.

I do not go into the sections that prescribe the heights and widths and gradients, and so on, of bridges which are to be built in a particular way because it cannot be contended, I do not think that even the learned counsel for the appellants have argued, that these provisions apply to bridges over footpaths, and if they do not apply to bridges over a footpath, if those are the things referred to in s. 46 as the obligations contained in the Act (I leave out the special Act because by the hypothesis there is no such provision there) then it appears to me that the absurdity is too manifest to require further exposition, that a bridge over a footway is to be included in a provision as to bridges which applies to turnpikes and carriage roads, and is not applicable to footpaths at all. Under these circumstances I move your Lordships that the order appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

LORD WATSON.—I think it is very clear that the court has no jurisdiction whatever to make the order which the appellants crave. Section 46 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, deals with the erection of bridges in two sets of circumstances, it deals with bridges, in the first place, the height, width, and dimensions of which are prescribed by the Act itself; and it also deals, in the second place, with bridges, the height, width, and dimensions of which may at a future time be prescribed by a special Act of a railway company. The special Act of the railway company, who are the defendants in this case, does not make any such prescription, and therefore the case against them is necessarily based upon the terms of s. 46 of the Act of 1845. From the beginning to the end of that clause, there are no words which impose upon a railway company any obligation except to erect bridges of the height, width, and dimensions specified either in that Act or in the special Act, and in these circumstances the court can only exercise the right of enforcing that obligation. But the obligation not being imposed, the general right is not conferred upon the court of directing the railway company to erect any bridge over, it may be, a public footpath which they think proper.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the fallacy which runs through the argument of the learned counsel for the appellants, who both put their case very clearly and forcibly before the House, arises from this, that the fact is overlooked that the statute of 1845 has not of itself any operation in respect of any road whatsoever, whether a carriage way, a footpath, or a public road; it can only be brought into effect by some rights being given and corresponding obligations created by a special Act. When that special Act is passed, then within the area which it covers those sections and the provisions of the special Act together come into operation. That is the scheme of legislation. Certain provisions have been inserted in these clauses which it is assumed will meet the general case, and will save the trouble of specific legislation in respect of them. Being general rules they may of course be departed from in a particular case if the special legislation so provides. In the absence of such special legislation they are brought into operation by the special Act, but the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, does not profess to provide for every case. It recognises that there may be cases, perhaps many cases, in which the matter is better left to be dealt with in a special Act, and in my opinion the case of bridges over footways is one of those cases. It is not an oversight, it is not clumsy legislation. It is, as far as I can see, the design of the legislature that, whereas, in the case of carriage ways or turnpike roads a general rule could be laid down in the general Act, in the case of footways a general rule cannot be laid down in the general Act, but provisions in respect of the matter must be left to be dealt with by the special Act. But the legislation in s. 46 is so framed that, when you deal with footways in respect of a particular railway by the special Act, then s. 46, having the general word "highway," applies to all those footways just as much as if the provision in respect of them had been found in the general Act instead of being inserted in the special Act. That makes the whole of the legislation

A perfectly consistent and perfectly intelligible, and gets rid of all the suggested difficulties that have been pressed upon your Lordships by the learned counsel for the appellants. For these reasons I think the judgment should be affirmed.

Practice—Parties—Joinder—Different causes of action—Different defendants—Claim against directors of company for fraud—Claim against company for declaration that dividend ultra vires—R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 1.

In an action against the directors of a limited company and the company, the plaintiff claimed damages against the directors for fraudulently inducing him to buy shares in the company, and in his particulars of their alleged fraud he stated that they had wrongfully declared and paid an interim dividend which was not paid out of the profits of the company. The plaintiff also claimed on behalf of himself and all other shareholders of the company a declaration that the declaration of the interim dividend was ultra vires and illegal, and an order against the directors for repayment of such money to the company.

Held: the two causes of action did not arise "out of the same transaction or series of transactions" within R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 1; and, accordingly, they could not be joined in one action.

Appeal by the defendants in an action, from a decision of DARLING, J., affirming an order of the master refusing to strike out the plaintiff's statement of claim, on the defendants' summons to strike out, on the grounds that the Rules of the Supreme court did not allow such a joinder of causes of action and that there would be great inconvenience in trying the two cases together.

The action was brought by "Frederick Stroud on his own behalf and also on behalf of himself and all other the shareholders in the Beeston Pneumatic Tyre Co.", against Harry John Lawson, James Arnold Bradshaw, and Henry Jelley and also the Beeston Pneumatic Tyre Co., Ltd. (so far as material).

By the statement of claim it was alleged that the defendants Lawson, Bradshaw, and Jelley were the directors of the Beeston Pneumatic Tyre Co., Ltd. The defendants were at the time of the happening of the events complained of also the holders of a large number of shares in the company and otherwise largely personally interested in the company. The shares of the company were then selling at a very low price, considerably under their face value. The defendants Lawson, Bradshaw, and Jelley, intending and contriving to defraud the public and benefit themselves, conspired together and also separately endeavoured by means of deceit and fraud, to cheat and defraud such members of the public as could be induced to purchase shares in the company at extravagant prices and far beyond their real value. The particulars of the same defendants' deceit and fraud as follows: (a) They and each of them deceitfully and fraudulently made or authorised the public statement that each share in the company was worth a figure much in excess of its face value . . . (c) They and each of them also deceitfully and fraudulently made or authorised the public statement that they had been offered £15 per share . . . (d) On or about May 7, 1896, the defendants, as directors of the company, declared and, in the month of June, 1896, paid an interim dividend of 100 per cent. (in all the sum of £30,000) on and in respect of the ordinary shares of the company, but such dividend was not, nor was any part thereof, paid out of the profits of the company, nor did the profits of the company allow of any such payment, but the said sum, £30,000, was obtained by the defendants as such directors as aforesaid from the British Motor Syndicate, Ltd. (of which the defendant Lawson was the chairman), and for which sum of £30,000 the said defendants (as such directors as aforesaid) wrongfully issued to the said British Motor Syndicate, Ltd., 15,000 fully paid ordinary shares in the company, namely, at the price of £2 per share.

The plaintiff alleged that he had suffered damage in that (on the faith of the making and publication by or with the authority of the defendants Lawson, Bradshaw, and Jelley of the statements and declarations of the interim dividend which the defendants intended should come to his knowledge, and be acted upon by him, and the plaintiff, believing, as the defendants intended he should believe, that the statements and declaration of dividend were genuine and bona fide), the plaintiff purchased twenty ordinary shares of the company for the sum of £161 10s. 6d. and 100 ordinary shares of the company for the sum of £509 11s. 7d. The shares had fallen greatly in price, and the same were not, and never had been, worth more than their face value or thereabouts. The plaintiff, on behalf of himself and all the other shareholders in the company, said that the interim dividend was ultra vires and illegal. He claimed: (i) On his own behalf, £550 damages occasioned to him by the aforesaid deceit and fraud of the defendants (other than the company); (ii) on behalf of himself and all the other shareholders in the company, a declaration that the declaration of the said dividend of 100 per cent. was ultra vires and illegal, and that the defendants (other than the company) are jointly and severally liable to make good to the company all moneys paid by them out of the company's assets on account or in respect of the said dividend, and judgment against them jointly and severally for repayment of such moneys accordingly; (iii) costs.

Mattinson, Q.C., and G. F. Hart for the plaintiff.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—There are two distinct causes of action appearing on this statement of claim, and, in my opinion, the plaintiff cannot go on with both, but we must put him to his election as to which he will proceed with.

The plaintiff sues in the first place on behalf of himself alone, and he claims damages from the first three defendants in respect of alleged false and fraudulent representations by them by means of which they cheated him into becoming a shareholder in the company. That is an ordinary common law action of deceit. In the second place the plaintiff sues in another capacity, on behalf of himself and all other the shareholders in the company, and his claim is merely based on the alleged payment of a dividend out of capital by the three defendants. He alleges that the payment of the dividend was ultra vires, and he asks on behalf of himself and the other shareholders of the company that the three defendants may be directed to return the money paid away by them to the company that the company may use it for the benefit of the shareholders generally. In making a claim like that the plaintiff is obliged to sue as he has done on behalf of all the shareholders in the company, and he is also obliged to make the company a defendant in the action. It is a well-known form of action and one which formerly would have had to be commenced in chancery. That cause of action is here joined to the plaintiff's common law action of deceit. They are two separate and distinct causes of action, and do not arise out of the same transaction or series of transactions. There are different plaintiffs and different defendants in the two cases, and, in my opinion, the matter is not one which is within the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 1.

That rule was drawn up after the decisions in Carter v. Rigby & Co. (1), where an action was brought by the representatives of fifty miners who were drowned by the flooding of a coal mine, which was alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants, and Smurthwaite v. Hannay (2). That was the case where sixteen holders of separate bills of lading joined in an action for non-delivery of certain bales of cotton shipped in the defendants' ship. The number of bales landed was short of the number in the bills of lading, and as many of the marks on the bales landed were obliterated it was impossible to identify such bales with those mentioned in the bills. It was held in the House of Lords that, as the causes of action were several, the holders of the bills of lading could not join in one action. In the Court of Appeal LORD ESHER, M.R., thought that all the claims sufficiently constituted one transaction to justify the plaintiffs joining in one action under the rule as it then existed. BOWEN, L.J., differed, and his opinion was upheld in the House of Lords, where it was decided that the plaintiffs could not sue together in one action. Then in 1896 came Carter v. Rigby & Co. (1). There the personal representatives of fifty miners, who had been drowned in the flooding of a coal mine, attempted to join in one action against the owners of the mine on the ground that it was one act of negligence on the part of the defendants which caused the flooding of the mine and the death of the miners. There also it was held that the plaintiffs could not join and sue in one action. The same question was also decided by the Privy Council in Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co. v. Tsune Kijima (3).

In consequence of these cases the present rule was made in 1896 which refers to a claim for relief "in respect of or arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions." To bring themselves within that rule plaintiffs must show that their claims are in respect of or arise out of "the same transaction or series of transactions." That has not been shown in the present case, and therefore, I think that we ought to put the plaintiff to his election which claim he will proceed with, the action of deceit in which he seeks for damages for himself, or the action on behalf of the shareholders of the company, having reference only to the ultra vires declaration of the dividend. Under these circumstances the appeal will be allowed.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that there are here two separate plaintiffs and two causes of action. The first cause of action is the fraud alleged to have been perpetrated on the plaintiff by the three directors of the company, in inducing him to buy shares in the company. That is one distinct cause of action, and it does not arise out of the same transaction as the second cause of action which is the unlawful payment of dividend out of capital by the directors of the company. An action of that sort ought, prima facie, to be brought by the company, but in order to prevent directors from disputing just claims of this sort it has become the practice in such cases that one of the shareholders should be the plaintiff, suing on behalf of himself and the other shareholders, and that the company should be joined as a defendant so that it may receive the fruits of the action. Therefore in this action two separate plaintiffs and two separate causes of action have been joined together.

Then comes the question whether these two matters arise out of the same transaction within the meaning of R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 1. That rule was drawn up in view of the difficulties raised by Smurthwaite v. Hannay (2) and Carter v. Rigby & Co. (1). It is obvious that it was not thereby intended to allow any number of plaintiffs to join in one action any number of separate causes of action, but to effect a modification of the old rule by giving a limited power to plaintiffs with separate causes of action to join together in one action. The limitation is plainly expressed in the rule. The rule provides that

“All persons may be joined in one action as plaintiffs in whom any right to relief in respect of or arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative, where, if such persons brought separate actions, any common question of law or fact would arise . . . .”

To bring a case within that rule both those conditions must be complied with, i.e., the right to relief claimed by the different plaintiffs must be in respect of or arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions, and also a common question of law or fact must arise.

Applying that to the present case I come without hesitation to the conclusion that the rights to relief claimed in this action do not arise out of the same transaction. The first cause of action is that by conspiracy and various fraudulent devices the directors of the company induced the plaintiff to become a shareholder, one of these fraudulent devices being the declaration and payment of dividend out of capital. In this respect the plaintiff is not suing as a shareholder. As regards the other cause of action the plaintiff repeats the allegations as to the payment of dividend out of capital, but without alleging fraud on the part of the directors. In this part of the claim he is suing as a shareholder in the company on behalf of himself and the other shareholders. The circumstance that the payment of dividend out of capital is given as a part of the cause of action in the one case as well as the ground of relief in the other does not show that the rights to relief claimed in the two cases arise out of the same transaction. They arise out of different transactions though they have a feature in common. It is not necessary for me to say what cases I think the rule applies to. But in the course of the argument I referred to a case of several persons owning several graves in a graveyard having separate rights of action arising out of disturbance of the graves by one common act. In such a case they could all join in one action. The sum of my judgment is that the separate causes of action in the present case are not “in respect of or arising out of the same transaction.”

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree, but having regard to the importance of this rule I think it proper to express in my own language my reasons for my judgment and my view as to the meaning of the rule. I agree that in this case there are in substance two different plaintiffs, because the person who is bringing this action

A is suing in two different capacities. But that fact does not seem to me to be very material to the question now before us, because the very object of R.S.C. Ord. 16, r. 1, is to enable several plaintiffs with different causes of action to join in one action. With regard to the defendants I agree with the contention of counsel who appeared on behalf of the plaintiff that substantially there is only one set of defendants here, namely, the three directors. They are the real defendants. The company is named as a defendant, but it is put in only as part of the machinery of the action. But I do not know that it is a matter of much importance, in deciding the point now before us, whether as a matter of form there are more defendants with regard to the second cause of action than there are with regard to the first cause of action. For the purposes of the present case, however, I will treat the action as though it were brought simply against the three directors.

C That being so, the question arises whether, having regard to the terms of the present r. 1, of Ord. 16, we ought to allow these two causes of action to be joined in one action. It has been pointed out that these two causes of action are wholly different. One is simply for deceit, in the other the complaint is that the directors have done something ultra vires. But I do not understand that the present rule was intended to prevent the joinder of different causes of action. The intention was that the rule should facilitate such a joinder and should enable plaintiffs to join their causes of action in cases in which, previously to the rule, they had been held unable to do so as in Smurthwaite v. Hannay (2). The intention of the new rule was, under certain limitations, to allow plaintiffs to join different causes of action. What is the limitation under which such joinder is to be allowed? The words of the rule are,

E "All persons may be joined in one action, in whom any right to relief in respect of or arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative where, if such persons brought separate actions, any common question of law or fact would arise."

F I shall not concern myself about the latter words of the rule, because it is common ground that such a question would arise in the present case.

G But that is not enough to bring the case within the rule. As I pointed out in the course of the argument the two conditions, viz., that the right to relief must arise out of the same transaction or series of transactions, and that the case must be such that a common question of law or fact would arise, are not alternative. I am dealing now with that which is undoubtedly a condition of applying the rule, that the right to relief should be alleged to be "in respect of or arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions." That must be a feature common to all the causes of action of the different plaintiffs in the action. I do not take those words of the rule to mean that the whole of a transaction must be involved in all the causes of action which the plaintiffs desire to join. If there were a transaction, or series of transactions, in respect of which one plaintiff was interested up to a certain point, and other plaintiffs were interested not only up to that point but in the entire transaction, or series of transactions, from beginning to end, I think that under this rule such causes of action might clearly be joined, because there would be a transaction or series of transactions, in respect of which the various plaintiffs would all be claiming a right to relief, although their remedies or damages might be different.

I I wish to go further and point out why, according to my view, the plaintiff in the case before us ought to be put to his election as to which of the two causes of action mentioned in his statement of claim he will proceed with. In the first part of the statement of claim he complains that the directors made certain representations to him with the object of deceiving him, and that he was thereby deceived and has suffered damage. That is the transaction on which he bases his cause of action. Can it be contended that the cause of action put forward in the latter part of the statement of claim is based on the same transaction as the first-mentioned cause of action? Obviously it cannot. The transaction which consists in the improper A declaration and payment of dividend is not part and parcel of the transaction which consists in deceiving the plaintiff by false representation into becoming a share- holder. The allegations of the plaintiff which are absolutely essential to his cause of action for deceit show that the transaction on which he there relies is a wholly different one from that on which he claims relief on behalf of himself and the other B shareholders of the company. I think, therefore, that it is not true to say that the rights to relief claimed in the two parts of the statement of claim both arise out of the same transaction or series of transactions. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

LOVETT v. LOVETT

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), November 24, 25, 1897] D

46 W.R. 105; 42 Sol. Jo. 81]

Settlement—Marriage settlement—Trust, after death of parents, for child of marriage—Post-nuptial settlement by child, while infant, of interest under marriage settlement—No covenant to settle after-acquired property— Exercise by parent of power to appoint to child—Right of child to property. F

By a marriage settlement dated April 15, 1874, property was vested in trustees on trust to pay the income arising therefrom to the husband for life, then to the wife for life, and after the death of the survivor on trust for the children of the marriage as the husband and wife should appoint jointly or as the survivor of them should appoint. In default of appointment the property was to be held in trust for the children of the marriage. The husband died in October, 1886, leaving one child of the marriage, the plaintiff in this action. The plaintiff married in January, 1892, and on July 27, 1892, while still an infant, she entered into a post-nuptial settlement by which, after reciting that the property comprised in the settlement of April 15, 1874, was vested in trustees (subject to the mother's life interest) in trust for the plaintiff her heirs and assigns, she conveyed that property, subject to the mother's life interest, to the trustees of the post-nuptial settlement on certain trusts. The post-nuptial settlement did not contain any covenant by the plaintiff to settle after-acquired property. By deed dated Aug. 5, 1897, the mother exercised her power of appointment under the settlement of April 15, 1874, irrevocably appointing the property comprised in that settlement to the plaintiff absolutely for her separate use. The plaintiff claimed a declaration that she was entitled to the property and that it had not passed under the post-nuptial settlement. G H

Held: (i) on the true construction of the post-nuptial settlement, it passed nothing more than the plaintiff's existing interest under the settlement of April 15, 1874, at the date of the post-nuptial settlement, viz., her interest in default of appointment; accordingly, the post-nuptial settlement did not cover the possible future interest which the plaintiff might, and in fact did acquire, I under an exercise of the mother's power of appointment, and this was so even though the post-nuptial settlement recited that subject to the mother's life interest the plaintiff was entitled to the property she purported to assign, for the recital should be construed as incomplete in that it did not state the fact that the plaintiff's interest was defeasible by the exercise of the power of appointment; (ii) there had been no estoppel since equitable estoppel was not applicable in favour of a volunteer; there was no estoppel by the terms of the conveying part of the post-nuptial settlement, the conveyance being an innocent one; and for the reason given in (i) the recital did not amount to an estoppel; accordingly the plaintiff was entitled to the declaration.

Action claiming a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to the property comprised in a settlement dated April 15, 1874, subject to a life interest, on the ground that the interest which the plaintiff took under the exercise of a power of appointment contained in the settlement was not comprised in a later settlement dated July 27, 1892.

By a settlement dated April 15, 1874, made on the marriage of Maresco Lloyd Frederick and Maria Louisa Frederick, certain lands at Cappagh, in the county of Dublin, were conveyed to trustees on trust to pay the rents and profits to Maria Louisa Frederick for life, and it was thereby agreed that the trustees should invest the residue which, after certain payments therein mentioned, should remain of the purchase moneys to arise from the sale of an undivided one-fourth share of certain other hereditaments, situate at Lambeth and Camberwell, and pay the interest and annual profits to the said Maresco Lloyd Frederick for his life, and after his decease to the said Maria Louisa Frederick for her life, and after the decease of the survivor, should stand possessed of the said lands thereby conveyed, and of the residuary moneys and the income thereof in trust for all such one or more exclusively of the other or others of the children or such remoter issue of the marriage as therein

mentioned in such manner as the said Maresco Lloyd Frederick and Maria Louisa A Frederick should jointly appoint, and in default as the survivor should by deed or deeds with or without power of revocation and new appointment, or by his or her will or codicil appoint, and in default of such appointment, in trust for all the children of the marriage, and if there should be only one child, then the whole to be in trust for such child. Maresco Lloyd Frederick died in October, 1886. The plaintiff, who was the only child of the marriage, was born on Feb. 27, 1875, and on B Jan. 28, 1892, married the defendant R. J. A. Lovett.

By a post-nuptial settlement, dated July 27, 1892, and made between the defendant R. J. A. Lovett of the first part, the plaintiff of the second part, the said Maria Louisa Frederick of the third part, and the defendants Ernest N. Lovett and G. W. Browne of the fourth part, after reciting that there was issue of the C marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Frederick an only child, the plaintiff, an infant under the age of twenty-one years, who had attained the age of seventeen years on Feb. 27, 1892, and who shortly before that day had contracted a marriage in Ireland with the defendant, R. J. A. Lovett; that by virtue of the settlement of April 15, 1874, the lands at Cappagh were vested in the surviving trustee thereof on trust to pay the income thereof to the said Maria Louisa Frederick for life, and after her death to D stand ~~seised and possessed of the said lands in trust for the plaintiff, her heirs and~~ assigns; that by the same settlement the undivided share in the hereditaments at Lambeth and Camberwell (therein called the London estate) were vested in the same trustee on trusts for sale and investments, and to pay the income thereof to the said Maria Louisa Frederick for her life, and after her decease to stand possessed of the sale moneys in trust for the plaintiff, her heirs, executors, administrators and E assigns; and that by an order of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, made on June 28, 1892, under the Infant Settlements Act, 1855, and the Infant Marriage Act, 1860, the Lord Chancellor being of opinion that the settlement proposed to be effected by the deed was a proper settlement to be made on the plaintiff's marriage, and that the indenture was a proper indenture for giving effect to such settlement, had, pursuant to the Act of Parliament, sanctioned and approved of such settlement, and had F ordered the infant to be at liberty to execute the same on her marriage, it was witnessed that the plaintiff, in pursuance of the order and with the sanction of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland, conveyed the lands at Cappagh, subject to the life interest of Maria Louisa Frederick therein, to the trustees on trust to sell and to pay the income to the plaintiff for her life, and after her death to the defendant R. J. A. Lovett for his life, and on the death of the G survivor, on the usual trusts for their issue with a trust in default of issue in favour of the plaintiff. And the plaintiff also conveyed to the trustees the proceeds of sale and conversion of the undivided share of the London estate to which she was entitled under the indenture of settlement of April 15, 1874, in remainder expectant on the decease of Maria Louisa Frederick on similar trusts. The settlement did not contain any covenant to settle the plaintiff's after-acquired property or any power H of revocation.

By a deed-poll, dated Aug. 5, 1897, Maria Louisa Frederick, in exercise of the power contained in the settlement of April 15, 1874, absolutely and irrevocably appointed that the trustee or trustees for the time being of that settlement, from and immediately after her decease, and in the meantime subject to her life interest, should stand ~~seised and possessed of the whole of the land and hereditaments, trust I~~ funds, and premises, comprised in or subject to the trusts of the same indenture in trust for the plaintiff, her executors, administrators, and assigns, absolutely for her separate use.

The plaintiff brought this action, claiming the declaration.

ROMER, J.—The result at which I have arrived no doubt may appear somewhat startling, but after consideration, contrary to my first impression, I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief she claims. The cases that have been cited before me I think establish, and in my opinion it is now the law, that if a person assigns his interest in property, whether real or personal, to which at the time he is entitled in default of appointment by another person, and afterwards he obtains that property under an exercise of the overriding power of appointment, he can claim the property notwithstanding the assignment, and even though the power was limited to a class of which he was one, and though that power and his interest in default of appointment were both created by the same settlement or instrument, the reason being that the interest he obtained by the exercise of the power was a distinct one from that he possessed at the date of the assignment. I apply that principle to the case before me. I bear in mind that the deed was a settlement by an infant of her then property. Prima facie it would only pass her then interest under the settlement referred to in the deed, and not an interest she had not then and only obtained afterwards, namely, the interest under the exercise of the power of appointment by the mother. Ought I in the first place to construe the deed, dealing with it as a question of construction, as one intended to pass this possible future interest—this expectancy? In the absence of some overwhelming reason to the contrary, I think I ought not to do so, bearing in mind, as I have already said, that the lady was an infant at the time, and seeing that the deed does not purport to pass anything but estates and interests then existing, and does not purport to settle or deal with after-acquired property. In the deed of settlement there is no reference whatever to the power of appointment. Had it been intended to release that power, or to prevent its being exercised, that could easily have been effected. The power could have been released, or if so intended, the mother might have exercised it in the settlement or immediately before it. There is no covenant in this deed referring to a settlement, and nothing that I can find which binds the mother or the infant in any way that the power to appoint shall not be exercised.

The main contention of the trustees, who have very properly brought before me all the considerations which ought to bear in this case in favour of those claiming under the settlement, has been the recital in the deed of the lady's title. I look at that recital, and, except that it does not go far enough, so far as it does go it appears to me accurate. The infant was entitled as the matter then stood, subject to the life interest of her mother, to the property she purports to assign. What the recital does not say, and what no doubt it ought to have said, is this—that her estate and interest was liable to be defeated by an exercise of a power of appointment. It appears to me, looking at the considerations I have already pointed out, the form of this deed, and the position of the infant, that I ought to give a reasonable construction to this recital and make it accord with the facts, as in fact it does if you treat it as an incomplete recital or as a recital not stating all the facts, and I think it ought to be treated as a statement of what her then interest was, and as omitting reference to the fact that that interest was defeasible. Dealing, therefore, with this matter as a question of construction, it appears to me, as I have already said, that I ought not to construe this deed as intended to pass anything more than the lady's then interest in the property, and the property she was then entitled to, and, as I have already pointed out, that would not cover a property, an interest, or an estate which she had not then and did not acquire until after the settlement.

That appears to me really to dispose of this case, for I am satisfied that here there is no estoppel. Certainly, in my opinion, there cannot be any equitable estoppel. The principle of equitable estoppel has been, if I may say so, clearly stated by LORD SELBORNE in the case which has been cited before me of Citizens' Bank of Louisiana v. First National Bank of New Orleans (1), and it shows that equitable estoppel is not applied in favour of a volunteer, nor in this case can I see any estoppel at all. I can find no estoppel by the terms of the conveying part of the deed, the conveyance being what is called an innocent one, and I can find no

estoppel in the recital for the reasons I have already pointed out in dealing with the question of construction. That recital can have a meaning given to it which is in strict accordance with the facts, and need not be construed as a statement of what was not true at the time. It follows, in my opinion, that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief she has claimed, that is to say, the relief she has claimed at the bar, which is limited to the property which passed under the marriage settlement. There will be a declaration that the interest taken by the plaintiff under the exercise of the power of appointment is not comprised in the settlement.

Undefended Petition by Mary Theresa De Laubenque for the dissolution of her marriage with Gustave De Laubenque, on the ground of the latter's adultery and desertion.

The marriage took place in Edinburgh on Sept. 1, 1888, under the following circumstances. The petitioner, then Mary Theresa Adair, resided with her parents in Edinburgh. The respondent was a medical student, at Edinburgh University. In 1887 he made the acquaintance of the petitioner, and subsequently became an intimate friend of the petitioner's family. An attachment grew up between the petitioner and respondent, and they became engaged, with the consent of the petitioner's father, John Adair. The respondent attempted to persuade the petitioner to elope with him to Paris, and to be married there, but this the petitioner refused to do. Eventually she consented to be secretly married to the respondent at a

A registry office in Edinburgh, and to elope with him afterwards. Before the marriage took place the petitioner's parents discovered her intention. Finding her set on the marriage, her father agreed that the marriage should take place; but being under the impression that the domicile and nationality of the respondent were French, declined to allow the parties to cohabit until any formalities necessary by French law had been complied with. The marriage was accordingly solemnized before the registrar, and, the parties being both Roman Catholics, also at the Roman Catholic cathedral.

The parties separated on leaving the church, and the petitioner only saw the respondent twice afterwards, on both occasions in the presence of her father. Subsequently the respondent went to Paris under the pretence of satisfying John Adair as to his nationality and the necessities of the French law. John Adair became suspicious, and followed the respondent to Paris. There he discovered that the respondent was a man of no means and had been born at St. Lucia and was a British subject. John Adair informed the respondent that when he had the means of providing a home his daughter was ready for him. The petitioner, however, swore that she was willing to go to the respondent at any time on his request and without proof of his means, and that she had never authorised her father to enter into any agreement making her consent to cohabitation conditional. From October, 1888, the respondent had made no communication to the petitioner. The petitioner's father, John Adair, in 1892 obtained a dispensation from the Pope, declaring the marriage null and void. In 1896 it was discovered that the respondent was living in England in adultery with another woman, and the present proceedings were instituted. Evidence was given of the facts, and also that the respondent's domicile was English.

SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P.—I think this case is made out. I am satisfied as to the husband's domicile, and I think the adultery is clearly proved. The only remaining question is the question of desertion. The facts show that for some reason the husband determined soon after the marriage not to consort with his wife. There was, therefore, no cohabitation between the parties; and the question which I have to determine is, whether there must be cohabitation to render desertion possible. I do not think there is any necessity for cohabitation. I think the cases referred to in argument—Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald (1) and Buckmaster v. Buckmaster (2)—merely decide that as long as there is a bargain between husband and wife to live apart the husband's neglect to consort with his wife cannot during the continuance of the bargain constitute desertion. My only doubt here is due to the statement of the wife's father to the husband. That statement might have released the husband from his obligation to consort with his wife if it had been made with her authority or assent. I am, however, satisfied that the wife herself was always ready and willing to go to the husband, and that she entered into no bargain to live apart. The statement of the father is not really inconsistent with the wife's evidence. I think the facts in this case constitute desertion, and there will be a decree nisi with costs.

GRAND JUNCTION WATERWORKS CO. v. HAMPTON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Stirling, J.), June 7, 8, 14, 1898]

[Reported [1898] 2 Ch. 331; 67 L.J.Ch. 603; 78 L.T. 673;

Street—Building line—Infringement—Pumping station of water undertaking—Penalty—Recovery by local authority before inferior court—Jurisdiction of High Court to restrain.

By s. 3 of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888 [which is substantially re-enacted by s. 75 of the Highways Act, 1959: 39 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 498], it was provided that, under a monetary penalty, it should not be lawful to erect or bring forward any house or building in any street beyond the front main wall of the house or building on either side thereof. By s. 251 of the Public Health Act, 1875 [see now s. 264 (6) of the Highways Act, 1959: supra, p. 682], penalties for offences under the Public Health Acts could be recovered in a court of summary jurisdiction.

The plaintiffs, a waterworks company, purporting to act under their local Act, began to erect a pumping station on a piece of land abutting on a street. The defendants, the local authority, gave them notice that, as the new building would extend beyond the building line prescribed by s. 3 of the Act of 1888, they could not give their consent, they then proceeded against the company before the magistrates who found the company to be in breach of s. 3 and ordered them to pay penalties. The plaintiffs thereupon brought an action for a declaration that they were entitled to build without interference by the defendants.

Held: while the court had jurisdiction in a proper case to restrain a public authority empowered to sue for penalties from proceeding before an inferior tribunal to recover, or to make a declaration of right regarding that matter without giving any consequential relief, that jurisdiction should only be exercised in very special circumstances; again in cases relating to the building line the legislature had provided a cheap and short mode of obtaining a decision, and it would be a matter of regret if a different and more expensive mode of obtaining that decision were to be resorted to in the absence of very special circumstances; there were no special circumstances in the present case; and, therefore, the action failed.

F Adjourned Summons for the determination of preliminary questions of law raised by the defendants, the Hampton Urban District Council, in their defence to the action.

G The action was brought by the Grand Junction Waterworks Co., a company incorporated by a private Act. Under their statutory powers the company acquired land within the jurisdiction of the Hampton Urban District Council and they proposed to build on the land additional pumping accommodation to secure an adequate supply of water within the limits of their operations. The defendant council informed the company that they would not allow the proposed building to be brought forward beyond the front main wall of the building on either side thereof and that the proposed erection was a contravention of s. 3 of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888. The company declined to agree with this view, and contended that under their statutory powers they had power to erect buildings on the land in question, and that such powers over rode the provisions of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888, with reference to the building line so as to admit of the company erecting their building where they found it necessary even if it be beyond the general line. The company proceeded to erect their building, and the council gave them formal notice to discontinue doing so. The plaintiffs then brought this action against the council for a declaration that they were entitled to continue with the building. The defendants put in a defence which contained among other defences the following:

I "11. The defendants, having regard to the provisions of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888, deny that upon the true construction of the plaintiff company's Act the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, and the other Acts incorporated with the company's said Acts the plaintiff company is entitled to erect their said engine-house or any other buildings they may think proper for the purposes of their said works upon any portion of the piece of land in the statement of claim specified without the consent of the defendants. . . .

13. The defendants object to the bringing of this action against them by the plaintiff company and submit the same is entirely without procedure, and will contend at the trial: (a) That this company has not, having regard to the matters hereinbefore mentioned and to the provisions of the Judicature Acts and the Rules of the High Court made thereunder, any jurisdiction to make the declaration prayed for herein. In the alternative (b) that the court in the exercise of its discretion ought not to make the said declaration, but that the plaintiff company should be left to establish their defence (if any) before the special tribunal entrusted with the determination of the question involved in pursuance of the statutes in that case made and provided subject to their right of appeal to a Divisional Court of the High Court of Justice, provided for by s. 45 of the Judicature Act, 1873, the decision of which said court is by s. 47 of the said statute made final and without appeal, and that by reason thereof that this action should be dismissed."

The present summons was then taken out for leave to have the questions of law raised by the defence decided before the action was further proceeded with.

Bosanquet, Q.C., Macmorran, Q.C., and R. C. Glen for the plaintiffs.

Jenkins, Q.C., and Courthope-Munroe for the defendant council.

June 14, 1898. STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, continued:—I have to consider both points raised by para. 13 of the defence. The enactment relied on by the defendants is s. 3 of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888, which repeals s. 156 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and in lieu thereof, enacts as follows:

"It shall not be lawful in any urban district, without the written consent of the urban authority, to erect or bring forward any house or building in any street, or any part of such house or building, beyond the front main wall of the house or building on either side thereof in the same street, nor to build any addition to any house or building beyond the front main wall of the house or building on either side of the same. Any person offending against this enactment shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s. for every day during which the offence is continued after written notice in this behalf from the urban authority."

It is not in dispute that this building of the plaintiffs does project beyond the front main wall on either side, and when the matter was brought before the magistrates under s. 251 of the Public Health Act, 1875, they inflicted fines on the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs thereupon applied for a Special Case on which to go to the Divisional Court.

The question is: Ought I to allow this action to go on? The writ and statement of claim simply ask for a declaration and for no other relief whatever. The form of action is justified by an appeal to Ord. 25, r. 5, which provides that:

"No action of proceeding shall be open to objection on the ground that a merely declaratory judgment or order is sought thereby and the court may make binding declarations of right whether any consequential relief is or could be claimed or not."

The last part of that rule is expressed in the very widest terms. It is said, however, that these wide words must be read with some limitations, and it is suggested that the court has no authority, notwithstanding that rule, to make any declaration because neither before nor after the Judicature Acts could any relief be given. I am not called upon, as it seems to me, to decide whether any such limitations are to be read into the rule. I am not satisfied that in this case there is an entire absence of jurisdiction to give consequential relief, at all events in the present state of the authorities.

The material authorities appear to be three. First Lord Auckland v. Westminster Local Board of Works (1). That arose, not under this Act, upon which there appears to be no decision, but under the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862. That Act contained two sections very similar in their nature to s. 3 of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888. One was s. 74, which provided for what I may call rectifying the general line of the street where buildings extend beyond it. It enacts that

“In case any building . . . which shall in any part thereof project beyond the general line of the street in which the same may be situate or beyond the front of the building wall or railing on either side thereof shall at any time be taken down to an extent exceeding one half of such building . . . or shall be destroyed by fire or other casualty or demolished, pulled down, or removed from any other cause to the extent aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the Metropolitan Board of Works to require the same to be set back to such a line and in such a manner for the improvement of any street as the said board shall direct . . .”

Section 75 says :

“No building, structure, or erection shall without the consent in writing of the Metropolitan Board of Works be erected beyond the general line of buildings in any street, place, or row of houses in which the same is situate to cause the distance of such line of buildings from the highway does not exceed fifty feet, or within fifty feet of the highway when the distance of the line of buildings thereupon amounts to or exceeds fifty feet, notwithstanding there being gardens or vacant spaces between the line of buildings and the highway, such general line of buildings to be decided by the superintending architect to the Metropolitan Board of Works for the time being; and in case any building, structure, or erection be erected, or begun to be erected or raised, without such consent, or contrary to the terms and conditions on which the same may have been granted, it shall be lawful for the vestry of the parish or the board of works for the district in which such building or erection is situate to cause to be made complaint thereof before a justice of the peace, who shall thereupon issue a summons requiring the owner or occupier of the premises, or the builder or person engaged in any work contrary to this enactment; (b) to appear at a time and place to be stated in the summons to answer such complaint; and if at the time and place appointed in such summons the said complaint shall be proved to the satisfaction of the justice before whom the same shall be heard; (c) such justice shall make an order in writing on such owner or occupier, builder, or person, directing the demolition of any such building or erection or so much thereof as may be beyond the said general line so fixed as aforesaid, within such time as such justice shall consider reasonable, and shall also make an order for the payment of the costs incurred up to the time of hearing, and in default of the building or erection complained of being demolished within the time limited by the said order the said vestry or board shall forthwith enter the premises to which the order relates and demolish the building or erection complained of, and do whatever may be necessary to execute the said order, and may also remove the materials to a convenient place, and subsequently sell the same as they think fit; and all the expenses incurred by the said vestry or board in carrying out the said order, and in disposal of the said materials, may be recovered by the said vestry or board from the owner or occupier of the said premises, or the builder or person engaged in the work, either by action at law or in a summary manner before the justice of the peace at the option of the said vestry or board, in manner provided by s. 277 of the firstly recited Act as to the recovery of penalties.”

The Westminster Board of Works took proceedings under s. 75. The contention of Lord Auckland, who was the owner of certain lands with respect to which the proceedings were taken, was that the case fell, not within s. 75, but within s. 74. MALINS, V.-C., and the Court of Appeal consisting of JAMES and MELLISH, L.JJ., were of opinion that the case did not fall within s. 75, but fell within s. 74, and consequently that the magistrate before whom the summons was taken out under s. 75 had no jurisdiction to deal with the case, that section not being applicable. Both the Vice-Chancellor and the Court of Appeal granted an injunction in very wide terms which I have before me, and which does not appear in the report, including an injunction against taking any proceedings for the purpose of compelling the plaintiffs' builder to abstain from erecting buildings on the land in question and also to restrain the board, their servants, solicitors, and agents, from taking any proceedings for the purpose of recovering from the plaintiffs penalties under the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862. The ground on which this is put by JAMES, L.J., in this (7 Ch. App. at p. 603) :

"The plaintiff, Lord Auckland, comes to this court and complains that a public body threaten and intend under colour of certain great powers given them by Act of Parliament to take and pull down some buildings which he has a right to erect and is about to erect on his own property. He complains that by these threats they have embarrassed him in the application of his property to the purpose he desires, and have in fact prevented him from erecting his building because they tell him in plain terms that if he does build they will put in force the powers of their Act and pull down his building. This being the complaint it appears to me to be a plain case for the exercise of the jurisdiction of the court. What is the case? A man files his bill with regard to a grievous wrong which is threatened to be inflicted on him by a public body, and he has a right to see whether this body has the power to inflict this wrong upon him; or at all events to try and relieve his title from the cloud which is put upon it by this proceeding which has been taken under a public Act of Parliament by public functionaries entrusted with great and arbitrary powers. It seems to me to be the same kind of case as those well-known cases in which this court has exercised its jurisdiction by restraining railway companies from proceeding to take land, which they had power to take for one purpose, for some other purpose for which they were not entitled to take it; or to take part of a house only where the law obliged them to take the whole of it. In those cases the court has stopped them at once and granted an injunction because they were about to exercise their powers in a manner that was offensive or in a manner that was illegal. I have no doubt, therefore, that this is a case within the jurisdiction of this court, and that it is a case proper for this court to decide once for all instead of obliging Lord Auckland to go before a magistrate and discuss before him the question of jurisdiction and the difficult construction of these Acts of Parliament, and then to carry the case to the Court of Queen's Bench by certiorari, or to take some other step to get it finally decided."

MELLISH, L.J., says (ibid. at p. 607), after expressing an opinion that as regards the site it was clearly within s. 74, and there was no power to proceed under s. 75 :

"That being so, I am further of opinion that this court has jurisdiction to grant relief in this case. The district board threatens that, if Lord Auckland should erect stables on this land, they will pull them down. It is true they must first go before a magistrate. If they do, he will probably tell them he has no jurisdiction; for it seems to me perfectly clear that he has no jurisdiction under this section. But I think Lord Auckland is entitled to say 'I will not wait to see whether a magistrate will decide rightly or wrongly as to his jurisdiction in this case. I will not go before a magistrate at all, but I will go into the Court of Chancery for an injunction to restrain you from pulling down my stables in a case where you have no power to pull them down.' "

That is an authority of the Court of Appeal, constituted by two very eminent judges, that the court has jurisdiction in a proper case to restrain a public authority empowered to sue for penalties from proceedings before the magistrate to recover these penalties.

That decision was criticised by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Kerr v. Preston Corpn. (2). There he refused an application which was made by the plaintiffs, the owners of certain houses, to restrain the corporation from taking summary proceedings to recover penalties under the Public Health Act on the ground that they had set forward the buildings without consent under s. 156 of that Act for which the Act of 1888 is now substituted. The Master of the Rolls said:

"The first question is whether there is equity to restrain a proceeding of the kind now threatened. It is a criminal proceeding instituted by information in the usual way and seeking to recover a penalty for a breach of certain laws which are sanctioned by the legislature. Why ought a court of equity to interfere with the ordinary proceedings of a criminal court? I am not aware that any such power exists. The point came before me in Small v. Browne (3), where I declined to interfere with criminal proceedings, or to follow LORD HARDWICKE's doubtful decision in York Corpn. v. Pillington (4). My decision was appealed from, and the lords justices thought it a right decision. With the exception of that case before LORD HARDWICKE there is no instance in which a court of equity has interfered in criminal proceedings. I do not say that the court might not interfere in a possible case, but as a general rule it will not. Then I come to the question whether there is any equity at all. I have been referred to Lord Auckland v. Westminster Local Board of Works (1), and speaking with all deference to the eminent judges who decided it, it appears to me that sufficient attention was not paid to the real facts of the case. The lords justices dealt with the case as if the Westminster Board of Works had threatened to pull down what they had no right to pull down, and, that being a wrongful act, they felt no doubt as to their jurisdiction to restrain it. If that had been the case here I should, without that decision, have granted an injunction, just as in the case of a railway company exceeding its powers. But, on reading the report, that was not the real state of the case at all. The Westminster Board of Works had not threatened to pull down the houses, but to apply to a magistrate for an order to pull down, and such an order could not have been made except by a magistrate having jurisdiction to make it; so that the application was really to restrain the board not from pulling down—as both the lords justices treated it—but from applying to a magistrate for an order to pull down. Consequently the judgment in that case has in fact no real application to the present case."

He goes on to say that there is nothing in the shape of acquiescence to conclude the local board in that case.

I observe that the Master of the Rolls had only the report of that case in 7 Ch. App. before him, and perhaps he was not aware of the form of order made in Lord Auckland's Case (1). But I confess it does seem to me that at all events the question was present to the mind of MELLISH, L.J., and I have little doubt that it was so also to JAMES, L.J. However, the criticisms are of a learned and eminent judge, of the decisions of the members of the Court of Appeal, which are entitled to great weight, and weight must be given to them in any consideration of the subject. On this the remark is to be made that SIR GEORGE JESSEL was sitting as Master of the Rolls and not in the Court of Appeal, and he, therefore, could not overrule the decision in Lord Auckland v. Westminster Local Board of Works (1).

The third case with which I have to deal is the subsequent one of Stannard v. St. Giles, Camberwell, Vestry (5). That again was a case in which there was an application of a similar character to these, though not precisely so, as it related to a question with regard to a drain. There a dispute had arisen between the local board and the builder about a drain with which buildings which the builder had erected interfered. They gave notice to enter and reinstate, and afterwards abandoned that and took proceedings before the magistrate. The plaintiff brought an action claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from trespassing on his land and from proceeding against him before the magistrate. In the statement of claim the plaintiff did not in terms allege that the defendants threatened and intended to trespass, and it was there held by the Court of Appeal that, as the defendants did not so threaten and intend, there was no case and no jurisdiction to restrain the proceedings before the magistrate. I am reading from the head-note (20 Ch.D. 190), which goes perhaps a little beyond the judgment given by the Court of Appeal. The facts must be taken to be that the local authority in that case simply threatened to proceed before the magistrate, and did not threaten to take the law into their own hands and enter the plaintiff's lands, and make the necessary alteration in the drain. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in deciding the case in the Court of Appeal, says (ibid. at p. 195):

"There is no allegation that that is a fact, and I believe the truth was that such an allegation could not be made. I think the defendants are right when they say that they did not intend to enter upon the land. But, whatever the effect of the notice of May 17 might have been, that course of proceeding was not one the defendants ultimately intended to adopt; and indeed the notice of Oct. 24, in my opinion, shows that clearly. However, the allegation is not there, and, as I said before, though the notice of May 17 standing alone and without any further proceeding or any further explanation would have been strong evidence of intention, it does not appear to me that there is here either sufficient allegation or sufficient evidence of intention on the part of the defendants to enter upon the plaintiff's land and commit a trespass. That would dispose of the case so far as the question of trespass is concerned; but the plaintiff goes on to ask an injunction to restrain the defendants from taking any proceedings before the magistrate. Now, as a general rule, it is quite plain you cannot do that. Where the legislature has pointed out a mode of proceeding before a magistrate it is not, as a general rule, for another court to interfere to stop that proceeding by injunction."

Then he discusses Hedley v. Bates (6), where he had himself, sitting at the Rolls, granted an injunction as he considered the magistrate had no jurisdiction. It is to be observed that in that case the proceedings before the magistrate had taken place and had been decided adversely, and thereupon he refused to interfere. On that ground both the Master of the Rolls and LORD HANNEN proceeded in that case.

That being the state of the authorities, which are really all the authorities, I do not think it would be right for me to say that there is absolutely no jurisdiction in the court to restrain proceedings before a magistrate. In this case, as in that of Stannard v. St. Giles, Camberwell, Vestry (5), there is no evidence, and, indeed, no allegation, that the defendants, the urban district council, threaten and intend to enter the lands of the plaintiff in any way. The statements in the statement of claim were admitted by counsel during the argument, and the allegations cannot go beyond showing an intention to proceed before the magistrate, as indeed is also shown by the correspondence. Therefore, there is no ground for the interference of the court, for in point of fact the defendants threaten and intend to do no illegal act. All that they threaten and intend to do, and have done, is to proceed before the magistrates in the way pointed out by s. 3 of the Act of 1888. Whether or not there be jurisdiction in the court to restrain by injunction such an application, it seems to me that to grant an injunction in such a case is a matter which requires the greatest possible caution. To adopt the language of the Master of the Rolls in the case I have cited,

"Where the legislature has pointed out a mode of proceeding before a magistrate it is not, as a general rule, for another court to interfere to stop that proceeding by injunction."

I desire to add that in the present case the contest is between the local authority and private owners, and it seems to me, therefore, that the rule ought to be adhered to somewhat strictly. In these matters as to building line the legislature has provided a cheap and short mode of obtaining a decision on the point in question. It appears to me that it would be matter of regret if a different and more expensive mode of obtaining that decision were to be lightly resorted to, or resorted to in the absence of very special circumstances. I confess that my experience, sitting here as a judge, leads me to believe that vestries and other local authorities are sometimes too ready to embark on costly litigation where there is no equivalent advantage to the public or others whom they represent; and I should be sorry that private individuals and such authorities, when a speedy mode of obtaining a decision can be resorted to, should resort to the more expensive mode. Therefore, in the exercise of the discretion which is vested in the court, I ought to be very slow to grant an injunction against taking proceedings before a magistrate when the legislature has pointed out that as the proper mode of proceeding. A fortiori it seems to me that, when the court is simply asked to make a declaration of right without giving any consequential relief, the court ought to be extremely cautious in granting such relief, and in making such a declaration in the absence of very special circumstances.

That brings me to the question whether any special circumstances are shown. In my judgment, there are none. I think, therefore, that this is a case where, in the exercise of discretion, the court ought not to interfere by way of injunction or to make a declaration in accordance with the prayer of the statement of claim. The matter is one which ought to be left to the decision of the tribunal pointed out by the Act of Parliament, which can adjudicate finally on the rights of the parties, and is the more proper court to decide that question. The action will be dismissed with costs.

Shipping—Maritime lien—Master's wages and disbursements—Vessel transferred to possession of prospective purchasers pending sale—Master appointed by purchasers—Sale not completed—Vessel re-taken by owners—Liability of owners to master.

In October, 1895, an agreement for the sale of the steamship Ripon City was entered into between the defendants, as managing owners of the vessel, and N. M. & Co., as purchasers. By the terms of that agreement it was provided that the vessel should be taken over by N. M. & Co. on completion of her then voyage, and by way of security for the payment of the purchase money that the defendants should remain registered owners of the vessel until they were in a position to transfer the whole sixty-four shares of the vessel and upon such transfer take a mortgage upon the entire steamer to secure due payment of the instalments of the purchase price. The vessel was taken over by N. M. & Co. in October, 1895, and from such time the defendants ceased to have any interest in the management or profits of the vessel. In October, 1896, eight sixty-fourth shares of the vessel were transferred to N. M. & Co., which shares were subsequently mortgaged by N. M. & Co. No further shares in the vessel were transferred to N. M. & Co. under the agreement, and in February, 1897, N. M. & Co. suspended payment, and the defendants re-took possession of the vessel. In May, 1896, the plaintiff, whom N. M. & Co. had appointed master of the ship, necessarily and properly purchased at Buenos Aires on account of the ship a quantity of bunker coals, and incurred charges for trimming the same, amounting together to £333 6s., for which sum he, on May 20, 1896, drew a bill of exchange on N. M. & Co. in favour of the suppliers of the coal, to whom the said sum was due, and payable fifty days after sight. In August, 1896, he purchased coals at La Plata, and incurred liabilities for moneys advanced to him on account of the ship, and drew a bill of exchange on N. M. & Co. for the sum of £910 8s. 6d. in favour of the coal merchants, to whom the sum was due, and payable fifty days after sight. The bills of exchange were accepted by N. M. & Co., and were duly presented for payment, but were dishonoured, and thereupon protested for non-payment, and notice of dishonour was given to the plaintiff. In January, 1897, the plaintiff drew two other bills of exchange on N. M. & Co., for coals purchased at Orkney Island and Copenhagen on account of the ship, which remained unpaid. The plaintiff claimed from the defendants £1,453 for the liabilities incurred on the bills of exchange, and, in addition, £83 for wages.

Held: a person who was allowed by the owner of a vessel to have possession of her to employ her in the ordinary manner must be presumed to have received authority from the owner to subject her to claims in respect of which maritime liens might attach arising out of matters occurring in the ordinary course of her employment; in the present case there was no evidence that the parties had so acted towards each other that the plaintiff was not entitled to rely on this presumed authority; and, therefore, his liabilities on the bills, which he had given in carrying out transactions in his capacity of master at the request of N. M. & Co., were liabilities incurred by him on account of the ship for which a maritime lien was conferred by s. 167 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and he was entitled to succeed.

Action in rem brought by the master of the steamship Ripon City against her registered owners to recover a sum representing a balance alleged to be due for wages and liabilities alleged to have been incurred by him for coal supplied to the ship. A

“(1.) The master of a ship shall, so far as the case permits, have the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of his wages as a seaman has under this Act, or by any law or custom. (2.) The master of a ship . . . shall, so far as the case permits, have the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of disbursements or liabilities properly made or incurred by him on account of the ship as a master has for the recovery of his wages.” B

May 6, 1897. GORELL BARNES, J., read the following judgment.—This case raises questions of very considerable importance to owners and masters of ships, especially steamships, and to merchants engaged in the business of supplying vessels with necessities.

In October, 1895, the defendants, Furness, Withy & Co., Ltd., of Hartlepool, the managing owners of the steamship Ripon City and owners of nearly all the shares in her, contracted provisionally to sell that vessel to Messrs. Neil, McLean & Co., of Glasgow, for the sum of £8,000 upon certain terms as to payment by instalments and security therefor. The vessel was to be taken over on completion of her then present voyage at Antwerp. In November, 1895, the contract was definitely agreed to and modified so that the sellers were to remain registered owners until they were in a position to transfer the whole shares (eighty-sixty-fourths being held in the names of other owners), and upon such transfer they were to take a mortgage on the entire steamer to secure due payment of the instalments of the price. The vessel was accordingly taken over by Neil, McLean & Co. in October, 1895, and worked by them afterwards, and in October, 1896, eighty-sixty-fourth shares were transferred to their senior partner, and £1,000, part of the purchase money, paid. He mortgaged these shares to other persons. No more shares were transferred to Neil, McLean & Co., or payments made by them, and they afterwards, on or about Feb. 2, 1897, suspended payment and Furness, Withy & Co. re-took possession of the vessel. D

In October, 1895, Neil, McLean & Co. appointed Captain Cormack, the plaintiff, as master of the Ripon City, and he took command of her at Antwerp and sailed her to the River Plate on their account. The ship's articles, dated Oct. 17, 1895, were signed by the plaintiff and described Neil, McLean & Co. as the registered managing owners. On Jan. 1, 1896, Neil, McLean & Co. entered into a contract with Cory Brothers & Co., Ltd., of London, for the supply of all coals required by the former during the year 1896 at certain ports, including Buenos Aires and La Plata, for the use of their steamers at certain specified prices. The contract contained a provision for a reduction of price in case the general market prices should fall below the agreed prices, and a clause in these terms : E

“Payment for coals and other necessities supplied to be by honour of captain's draft on the managing owners at fifty days' sight payable in London, and Cory Brothers & Co., Ltd., shall be entitled to cancel this contract on failure of such honour.” F

Neil, McLean & Co. had other coaling contracts for 1896, and they furnished the plaintiff with a memorandum headed “Coaling Contracts for 1896,” containing a list of the ports for which they had contracts, the contract prices, and the names of the firms who were to supply the coals. In May, 1896, the Ripon City was at Buenos Aires, and was supplied by Cory Brothers, Ltd., with 268 tons of coal under the coaling contract, for the price of which—viz., £333 6s.—the plaintiff drew a bill G

A of exchange dated May 20, 1896, on Neil, McLean & Co., in favour of Cory Brothers & Co., Ltd., at fifty days' sight. In August, 1896, the vessel was at La Plata, and was supplied by Cory Brothers & Co., Ltd., with 721 tons of coal under the contract for the price of which—viz., £896 4s. 6d.—and £14 4s. cash advanced to the plaintiff, he drew a bill of exchange for £910 8s. 6d., dated Aug. 10, 1896, on Neil, McLean & Co. in favour of Cory Brothers & Co., Ltd., at fifty days' sight. B The bills of exchange were accepted by Neil, McLean & Co. and were duly presented for payment, but were dishonoured, and were accordingly protested for non-payment. Notice of dishonour was duly given to the plaintiff. The coals were properly supplied for the necessary purposes of the vessel in order to enable her to perform the services on which she was engaged, and the small advance was, as I gather, necessarily and properly made for the purposes of the ship. The plaintiff C also drew two other small bills on Neil, McLean & Co. for coals supplied by other persons at the Orkneys and Copenhagen, which have not been paid; and he had in February, 1897, a claim for wages amounting to £83 0s. 3d.

After the suspension of Neil, McLean & Co. the plaintiff arrested the Ripon City in Scotland in respect of the wages and coals, and afterwards, on Feb. 13, 1897, he signed a memorandum authorising Cory Brothers & Co., Ltd., as his commissioners or mandatories, to exercise in his name, or their own, his right of lien against the Ripon City in respect of the two bills for £333 6s. and £910 8s. 6d., and on their recovering any money in virtue of any proceedings taken by them in his name or their own against the Ripon City, he thereby authorised them to apply the proceeds in extinction pro tanto of the amount of his indebtedness to them on the two bills, and declared their mandate irrevocable. The proceedings in D Scotland do not appear to have been continued. Cory Brothers & Co., Ltd., were the holders of the two bills. They appear to have arranged with the plaintiff that their solicitors should act in the matter, and on Feb. 17, 1897, their solicitors accordingly issued a writ in rem in this Division in the name of the plaintiff, E but really for the benefit of Messrs. Cory so far as concerns the amount of the two bills held by that firm, against the owners of the vessel (which, I presume, F had come to England) for the sum of £1,900, and bail in that amount was given by the defendants.

In the statement of claim in the action a claim was made not only in respect of the amount due to Messrs. Cory Brothers & Co., Ltd., but also for the amount of the plaintiff's liability in respect of the coals supplied at the Orkneys and Copenhagen and his wages. In their defence, delivered on Mar. 22, 1897, the defendants, G after stating the facts as to the ownership of the vessel, pleaded in effect that Neil, McLean & Co. were alone liable, and that the plaintiff's part in the transactions relating to the bills

H "was merely colourable and done for the purpose of attempting to give the said suppliers of the coals (for whose benefit the action is brought) a lien on the said vessel to the prejudice of the defendants," and that the plaintiff was not liable on the bills. The action was set down for trial on Mar. 27, and Furness, Withy & Co., Ltd., knowing that the action was really the action of Cory Brothers & Co., Ltd., endeavoured to see the plaintiff, but, being told that he could be seen at the solicitors' office, they appear to have determined to communicate direct with him, and after setting a watch for him, they ultimately found him, and on Mar. 24 in order to defeat the claim of Cory Brothers & Co., Ltd., arranged with the plaintiff a settlement of the action without the cognisance of the solicitors for Cory Brothers & Co., Ltd., or their own solicitors. The settlement was effected by Mr. Stoker, a director of Furness, Withy & Co., Ltd. assisted by Mr. Hull, a clerk, and Mr. Donald, an agent, of the firm. The plaintiff was paid £400, and a receipt was taken from him for that sum in full settlement of his claims against them in the action of Cormack v. Owners of the Steamship Ripon City, and he agreed to all proceedings in the said action being forthwith stayed, each party to pay their own costs of the action. A summons A was then taken out before me to stay the action, but I adjourned the summons to the hearing, and the case was accordingly heard on Mar. 27.

Three points were taken by the defendants' counsel: (i) that the plaintiff was not liable on the bills; (ii) that, even if he were liable, he had no maritime lien on the vessel for the amount of the bills; (iii) that the settlement effected with the plaintiff on the record was an answer to the action. The argument on the first point for B the defendants was that the coals were not ordered by the plaintiff, but were supplied under the coaling contract, and he merely put his name to the bills for the convenience of the suppliers of the coal, and received no consideration for drawing the bills. I believe that formerly, more than now, masters of steamers in foreign C ports themselves contracted at such ports for the supply of the coals they required and drew in their owners for the price, and do so still in certain cases; but at the present day many owners of steamers who have not coal supplies of their own in foreign ports are in the habit of entering into forward contracts with large coal suppliers who have depôts or agents at such ports for the supply of coal to any of their steamers which may visit those ports. The coal suppliers do not themselves draw on the owners for the price of the coal supplied, but, after supplying D the quantity of coals required by the master, take his draft in their favour upon the owners. In this way they not only have the personal liability of the master on the bill, but by putting pressure upon him can practically force him to proceed against the vessel for their benefit, and, as I understand, this is regarded as a valuable security by the coal suppliers. They have no right of process themselves against a British steamship for coals supplied to her where any part owner is (as E in this case) domiciled in England or Wales. Although, therefore, the master does not himself make the coal contract, he intervenes in it, fixes the quantity required, gives his order for that quantity, and then draws on his owners in favour of the suppliers for the price. He does not do so merely at the request and for the accommodation of the suppliers, but becomes a party to the bill in order to carry F out his owners' bargain and because he cannot obtain the coals without doing so. His signature is part of the consideration for the supply of the coals, and he accepts that position by carrying out the transaction in accordance with a course of business well known to him.

This was the manner in which the parties concerned dealt with each other in this case, and, in my opinion, the plaintiff became liable to Cory Brothers & Co., Ltd., on the bills. I have examined the proceedings in Morgan v. Castlegate Steamship Co., The Castlegate (1), and will refer presently to that case. I find that G the master, charterers, and coal suppliers acted in a similar manner to that adopted in the present case, and the master was sued by the suppliers of the coals, in an action which was tried in London before DAY, J., and a special jury, and he was held liable on the bills drawn by him for the price of the coals: see also Scott v. Lifford (2). The argument on the second point for the defendants was that the H master was not acting in his capacity as master in drawing the bills, that the case falls within the decision of The Orienta (3), and that, as the coals were supplied on the credit of Neil, McLean & Co., and not of Furness, Withy & Co., Ltd., he could not proceed to enforce a lien against the property of the latter. Dealing with the two earlier arguments, first, I am of opinion that in carrying out the transactions in question the master was acting within his ordinary capacity as I master of the vessel, although Neil, McLean & Co. had arranged the price and terms of supply of the coals. The contract required him to go to a particular firm for his coals, and fixed the price and terms, but he intervened to put it in operation by fixing the quantity required, giving the necessary orders therefor and drawing for the prices at the rates fixed. If there had been a decline in the general market price he would have had to arrange for the lower price. He carried out the transactions in his capacity as master at the request of his employers, and his liabilities incurred in doing so are, in my opinion (and subject to the next point to be considered), liabilities incurred by him on account of the ship for which a maritime lien is conferred by s. 167 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, which is a repetition of s. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1889 [repealed]. A contrary decision would involve immense hardship to masters of steamships, as it might deprive them of the security of the vessel to discharge liabilities which they have incurred in following a course of business which has become prevalent owing to the exigencies of modern commerce.

The case is distinguishable from The Orienta (3). In that case the master had nothing whatever to do with the order for or supply of the coals. Apparently after they had been supplied to a steamer in London, a home port, and were alongside of her, he voluntarily signed a draft at the request of his owners in favour of the suppliers for the price. The contract had a clause as to the master giving a draft somewhat similar to that in the present case. The President, in giving judgment, said that it was stated on behalf of the suppliers of the coals, that their object in stipulating for payment by the master's draft was to entitle themselves to a maritime lien by virtue of s. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1889 (the Act then in force), and that there could be no doubt that the owners intended by agreeing to confer such lien if they could, and the master gave the bills by arrangement with his owners for that purpose, and he held that the master in lending his name at the request of the owner was not in the circumstances acting within the ordinary course of his employment as master, and he gave judgment in favour of certain mortgagees who had intervened in the suit, giving the plaintiff leave to move for such judgment as he might be advised against the owners of the vessel. This decision was affirmed in the Court of Appeal. I may observe that it was not argued in that case that the master was not liable on the bills, possibly because he seems from the report to have drawn them at the request of his owners; though a point might, perhaps, have been made that in the peculiar facts of the case it might be inferred that he drew them as much at the request of the coal suppliers as of his owners for their joint accommodation. The distinction between that case and the present is broad. In the former the master did not properly incur liabilities on account of the ship in the ordinary course of his employment whereas in the present case he obtained the coals in the ordinary course of his employment as master of the vessel, and by so doing pledged the credit of Neil, McLean & Co. for them and rendered himself liable on the bills drawn by him. Without doing so he could not have obtained the coals which were necessary for the purpose of the navigation of the vessel on the service on which she was engaged. So that he did incur liabilities properly on account of the ship within the meaning of s. 167 of the Act of 1894, and, subject to the question raised by the last point taken in argument as aforesaid, in my opinion he obtained a maritime lien upon the vessel.

The last and most difficult question raised by the second point has to be considered—viz., whether the master acquired a maritime lien which can be enforced by him against a vessel legally owned by the defendants and not by Neil, McLean & Co. The proposition maintained by counsel for the defendants was that a maritime lien can only arise and be enforced against a vessel owned by persons who are personally liable to the party seeking to enforce the lien. For this proposition only The Parlement Belge (4), The Castlegate (1), and The Utopia (5), were cited. But there are a number of other cases which it is necessary to examine in order to arrive at a conclusion on the matter, and it will be convenient to deal with the cases in order of date.

In The Druid (6) DR. LUSHINGTON dismissed a cause of damage on the ground that the damage was wilfully committed by the master and the owners were not responsible for it. A passage in his judgment has been supposed to support the proposition in question, but that passage has been explained by SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE in The Lemington (7), and by SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., in The Tasmania (8). Yeo v. Tatem, The Orient (9), was a case where an agent for sale of a ship, without any authority from her owners, and with the intention of asserting his own rights to certain foreshore, moored her so as to cause damage to another ship, and a suit against the ship was dismissed. The damage was done in the first of these cases by a servant, and in the second by an agent acting, not only without authority, but unlawfully. The Ida (10) appears to have been decided on similar grounds. A

In The Ticonderoga (11) DR. LUSHINGTON held that a vessel under the exclusive control of certain charterers might be proceeded against in rem for damage to another vessel by collision occasioned by the default of the charterers' servants. B He says (Sw. at p. 217):

"We must recollect that this is a proceeding in rem. I am not aware, where there has been any proceeding in rem, and the vessel so proceeded against has been clearly guilty of damage, that any attempt has been made in this court to deprive the party complaining of the right he has by the maritime law of the world of proceedings against the property itself. Supposing a vessel is chartered so that the owners have divested themselves, for a pecuniary consideration, of all power, right, and authority over the vessel for a given time, and have left to the charterers the appointment of the master and crew, and suppose in that case the vessel had done damage and was proceeded against in this court;—I will admit, for the purpose of argument, that the charterers, and not the owners, would be responsible elsewhere, although I give no opinion upon that point;—but, still, I should here say to the parties who had received the damage that they had, by the maritime law of nations, a remedy against the ship itself. Let us see what cases there are in which the court does not hold a vessel responsible for the damage done. There is one case, and one only, that I am aware of, and that is where a pilot is taken on board by compulsion. On what principle is the owner, in that case, relieved from paying the damage done? On the principle of compulsion—the principle that the man is not the servant of the owner, but is forced upon him by Act of Parliament." C D E

In The Ruby Queen (12), the same judge, in a case where a yacht of the defendant was entrusted for reward to yachting agents for sale and by their servants moored in the winter season without striking her top gear, whereby on a gale occurring, the yacht drifted and fouled another yacht, held that the yacht was liable in a proceeding in rem in the Court of Admiralty. In The Edwin (13) the same learned judge held that the fact that a master was employed by one who had fraudulently obtained possession of a vessel will not prevent the master having a lien on the ship for his wages and disbursements if he has discharged his duties in ignorance of the fraud. The facts are only set out in pleadings, and the answer was struck out on motion, so far as it related to the alleged fraudulent possession. The case would seem to come within the class of cases in which the owners have given up possession to someone else, though it was alleged that they were induced to do so by fraud. The Lemington (7) was a similar case to The Ticonderoga (11). SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE referred to the passage I have quoted from The Ticonderoga (11), and said (32 L.T. at p. 72): F G H

"Vessels suffering damage from a chartered vessel are entitled prima facie to a maritime lien upon that ship, and look to the vessel as security for restitution. I cannot see how the owners of the res can take away that security by having temporarily transferred the possession to third parties." I

In The Parlement Belge (4) it was held that an unarmed packet belonging to the Sovereign of a foreign State, and in the hands of officers commissioned by him and employed in carrying mails, is not liable to be seized in rem to recover redress for a collision, and that this immunity is not lost by reason of the packet's also carrying merchandise and passengers for hire. The decision was that the courts cannot exercise jurisdiction over the person of any Sovereign or over the public property of any State which is destined to its public use, though such Sovereign or property is within this country. A passage from the judgment of BRETT, L.J., was relied on in the argument before me. It is as follows (5 P.D. at p. 218) :

“In a claim made in respect of a collision, the property is not treated as the delinquent per se. Though the ship has been in collision, and has caused injury by reason of the negligence or want of skill of those in charge of her, yet she cannot be made the means of compensation if those in charge of her were not the servants of her then owner, as if she was in charge of a compulsory pilot. This is conclusive to show that the liability to compensate must be fixed not merely on the property, but also on the owner through the property.”

This passage occurs in a part of the judgment in which BRETT, L.J., was dealing generally with an action in rem, the liabilities of owners, and of an innocent purchaser who takes the property, subject to maritime liens which attached to it as against him who was the owner at the time the lien was attached; but the meaning of this passage, so far as concerns the present case, depends on the sense in which the term “owner” is used. It may, as SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE points out in The Lemington (7), include persons who are placed in control of a vessel and hold her pro hac vice as owners. So read, there is nothing in it to affect the decisions in The Ticonderoga (11) and The Lemington (7).

In The Tasmania (8), a tug, while towing the plaintiffs’ vessel, came into collision with and sank her. The tug was chartered by a company to work with their own tugs, and they appointed the captain. It was held that an action in rem would not be against the tug, because the owners were not personally liable for the collision, and the charterers had exempted themselves from liability by the terms of the towing contract with the plaintiff. SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., after reviewing the cases said (13 P.D. at p. 118) :

“The result of the authorities cited appears to me to be this, that the maritime lien resulting from collision is not absolute. It is a prima facie liability of the ship, which may be rebutted by showing that the injury was done by the act of someone navigating the ship not deriving his authority from the owners; and that, by the maritime law, charterers, in whom the control of the ship has been vested by the owners, are deemed to have derived their authority from the owners so as to make the ship liable for the negligence of the charterers, who are pro hac vice owners. These propositions do not lead to the conclusion that where, as between the charterers and the person injured, the charterers are not liable, the ship remains liable nevertheless.”

The case principally relied on by the defendants was The Castlegate (1). There the owners of the Castlegate chartered her for six months to another firm, and by the charterparty it was agreed that the charterers should provide and pay for coals, and that the captain, though appointed by the owners, should be under the orders and directions of the charterers as regards employment, agency, or other arrangements. The charterers had a contract with a firm of coaling contractors for the supply of coals at foreign ports to their vessels, which is set out in the appendix to the case in the House of Lords, and, so far as is material, was substantially similar to the coal contract in the present case. In the course of a voyage under the charter it became necessary to procure coals abroad to enable the vessel to prosecute her voyage and earn her freight. The master, who had notice of the terms of the charterparty, obtained coals under the coaling contract and drew on the charterers for the value. The bills having been dishonoured, the master was sued on them, and judgment was recovered against him in the action in London. He then instituted a cause of disbursements in the High Court of Admiralty in Ireland against the ship and freight, and it was held by the Court of Appeal in Ireland and the House of Lords that he was not entitled to a maritime lien on the ship or freight.

Counsel for the defendants in the present case contended that the language used in the opinions in the House of Lords supports his contention, but the passages to which he referred must be read with regard to the facts dealt with and my A reading of the opinions is that they were not intended to cover such a case as that now presented for my decision. The point now raised was not before the House, and the real decision was the same as that in The Turgot (14), viz., that a master who with knowledge of a charterparty, under which the charterers are to provide and pay for coals, orders coals on their credit and draws on them for the value, B and had and knew that he had no authority, express or implied, to pledge the owner's credit for the coals, has not a maritime lien for the amount of his liability on the bills drawn for the price of the coals. This appears plainly from the following passage in LORD WATSON's speech. He says ([1893] A.C. at p. 53):

"I can find no reasons, either of equity or of policy, for enabling the master of a vessel, who is not bound to incur a liability, to relieve himself, when he C does choose to incur it, out of the property of his owners, although they may derive no benefit from it, and by the terms of his employment he is debarred from incurring it on their personal account."

It is thus apparent that the decision in The Castlegate (1) does not govern the present case.

The last case which I need refer to is The Utopia (5). There a vessel was wrecked D in Gibraltar Bay, and the port authorities took from the owners and assumed the task of protecting other vessels from the wreck and neglected that duty. It was held that the owners of a vessel colliding with the wreck could not proceed against the wreck for their damages. The Castlegate (1) and The Parlement Belge (4) are referred to in the judgment, but the ground of the decision appears to have been E that the authorities had taken action within the apparent scope of their powers as port authority, and that the owners could not be made liable for their default.
This decision does not, in my opinion, affect the present question.

Although at first sight it might appear difficult to reconcile these decisions and all that has been said on the important subject under discussion, I think it will appear that in reality there is little or no conflict in the cases, and that the decisions F are in accordance with certain ascertainable principles. That maritime liens arise in certain well-known classes of claims is now firmly established. The principles of maritime law in relation thereto have been developed to a large extent from certain principles of the civil law: see the learned judgment of CURTIS, J., in The Young Mechanic (15). So far as I can trace the origin of the modern doctrines in the subject of maritime liens, it is not difficult to follow this development in cases arising G out of contractual relations between the parties. But it is otherwise in cases of injuries done by vessels, and there is a diversity of opinion as to the source from which the notion of a lien for the amount of damage done is derived.

In his interesting and excellent work on the COMMON LAW, O. W. HOLMES, J., of Boston, finds this source in the ancient law of deodand, and considers that it is only by supposing the ship to have been treated as if endowed with personality H that the seemingly arbitrary peculiarities of the maritime law can be made intelligible. MR. MARSDEN, in his recent work on COLLISIONS AT SEA, on the other hand, prefers the theory that the present law of maritime lien for damage has sprung from the Admiralty practice of arrest to compel appearance and security: see (3rd Edn.), p. 76. This practice was similar to that which appears to have prevailed on the continent of Europe: ibid., p. 79; and may have been deduced from, or I suggested by, Roman procedure; see ORTOLAN'S INSTITUTES OF JUSTINIAN (12th Edn.), p. 586. If the former view be correct it would seem to be immaterial in a case of collision caused by the negligence of persons on board a vessel to inquire whether or not they were the servants of the owners or of persons in possession; but if the other theory is adopted the position is not quite the same.

The exhaustive judgment of the President, SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, in The Dictator
(16) favours the latter view. He investigates the Admiralty rules on this subject, as it had been treated for the last two centuries. He states that the Admiralty

A Court did not in early times treat the action in rem as a specific and distinct form of action, and explains how the process of the court was carried into effect by the arrest of the person or any property of the defendant to compel him to appear and put in bail; how actions beginning with arrest of the person became obsolete in the last century, and arrest of property to enforce appearance and security became rare and obsolete; how, in later times, the arrest of property over which a lien could be enforced became more common as the idea of a pre-existing maritime lien developed, and arrest of property in order to assert for the creditor a legal nexus over the proprietary interest of his debtor; and how, if the owners do not appear, the judgment should be limited to the res in the hands of the court, but if they appear they are in the same position as if they had been brought before the court by personal notice. In that case he allowed execution to issue against owners who had appeared in an action in rem to recover the amount by which a decree exceeded the amount of the bail in the case. Again, BRETT, L.J., in that part of his judgment in The Parlement Belge (4) from which the passage above quoted is taken, also expounds the nature of the process and how the owners are indirectly impleaded to answer the judgment of the court.

But, whatever may have been the origin and process of development of a maritime lien for damage, there is no doubt that the doctrine of such a lien is now established, and the right to enforce it is different from the ancient right of arrest to compel appearance and security in this, that it is confined to the property by means of which the damage is caused, and may be enforced against the property in the hands of an innocent purchaser. I believe that the earliest English authority which distinctly establishes this doctrine is Harmer v. Bell, The Bold Buccleugh (17), where it was held by the Privy Council that in cases of collision a maritime lien for damage arises and may be enforced against the vessel which was in fault, and that such lien travels with the vessel into whosoever possession she may come, and when carried into effect by a proceeding in rem relates back to the period when it first attached. The Bold Buccleugh (17) was approved by the House of Lords in Currie v. M'Knight (18), where the learned Lords considered the judgment of the Judicial Committee satisfactory in its reasoning, and that it was not only consistent with the principles of general maritime law, but rested upon plain considerations of commercial expediency: see per LORD WATSON.

The definition of a maritime lien as recognised by the law maritime given by LORD TENTERDEN has thus been adopted. It is a privileged claim upon a thing in respect of service done to it or injury caused by it, to be carried into effect by legal process. In the multitude of cases, both in former times and now, the dispute about a service rendered to, or damage done by, a ship arises between the claimant and the owners of the ship, so that it is not unnatural to speak in general terms of the liability of the res and of the owners as being convertible terms and of the process against the res as being a means of enforcing rights against the owners; but, whatever may be the exact history of maritime liens, in The Dictator (16) and The Parlement Belge (4), and in dicta which may be found in some of the other cases above mentioned to the effect that a maritime lien cannot arise and be enforced against a ship where the owners are not personally liable, I am convinced that the judges did not intend to decide that in no circumstances can a maritime lien be obtained unless the owners of the res are personally liable in respect of the claim. It will be found, in accordance with modern principles and authorities, that there are certain cases in which a maritime lien may exist and be enforced against the property of persons not personally liable for the claim, and who are not the persons who, or whose servants, have required the service or done the damage.

The result of my examination of these principles and authorities is as follows. The law now recognises maritime liens in certain classes of claims, the principal being bottomry, salvage, wages, masters' wages, disbursements and liabilities, and damage. According to the definition above given, such a lien is a privileged claim upon a vessel in respect of service done to it, or injury caused by it, A to be carried into effect by legal process. It is a right acquired by one over a thing belonging to another—a jus in re aliena. It is, so to speak, a subtraction from the absolute property of the owner in the thing. This right must, therefore, in some way have been derived from the owner either directly or through the acts of persons deriving their authority from the owner. The person who has acquired the right cannot be deprived of it by alienation of the thing by the owner. It does B not follow that a right to a personal claim against the owner of the res always co-exists with a right against the res. The right against the res may be conferred on such terms or under such circumstances that a person acquiring that right obtains the security of the res alone, and no rights against the owner thereof personally. A simple illustration of this is the case of bottomry.

Some of the cases I have examined above show that where the owners of a C ship have vested the control of the vessel in charterers the latter are deemed to have derived their authority from the owners so as to make the ship liable for the negligence of the charterers: The Ticonderoga (11) and The Lemington (7). A similar position results in a case like that of The Ruby Queen (12), where the yacht was entrusted to the agent. Again, a mortgagee of a vessel is the owner of D an interest in the vessel, and if he leaves the mortgagors in possession his interest will become subject to maritime liens arising in the course of the employment of the vessel, although he is not personally liable for the claims in respect of which the liens arise. In The Mary Ann (19) and The Feronia (20) decided at a time when the master was considered to have (as he now has by the statute of 1894)
a lien for his disbursements and liabilities properly made or incurred on account E of a ship, and before Hamilton v. Baker, The Sara (21) had decided that he had no such lien, it was held that the master's claim in respect of such disbursements and liabilities takes precedence over that of a mortgagee: see also The Fairport (22).
And it is every-day practice for the interests of mortgagees in vessels to be subjected to maritime liens for damage and other claims.

It was said that the case of a mortgagee is affected by the provisions of s. 34 F of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, which repeats the similar provisions of earlier Acts, but I believe that the foundation for the rules as to a mortgagee's position is to be found in the same principle as that upon which the judges have acted in the cases of the charterers above referred to. The mortgagee is towards an owner in possession much in the same position as an owner towards a charterer in possession.
The vessel is permitted by a party interested in her to be in another's possession G and employed so as to become subject to maritime liens. I may notice in passing that in the present case the eight sixty-fourth shares standing in the name of Neil, McLean & Co., though mortgaged, are, therefore, subject to the plaintiff's claims. Even at common law, if a vessel is left by a mortgagee in possession of the mortgagor the rights of the mortgagee are subject to any possessory lien which exists for work done to the ship by the orders of the mortgagor: Williams v. H Allsup (23). This is on a similar principle to that which I have indicated. So also a maritime lien for damage takes precedence of the claim of a bottomry bond-holder under a bond given prior to the time when the damage is done: The Aline (24).

The principle upon which owners who have handed over the possession and control of a vessel to charterers, and upon which mortgagees and others interested I in her, who have allowed the owners to remain in possession, are liable to have their property taken to satisfy claims in respect of matters which give rise to maritime liens may, in my opinion, be deduced from the general principles I have above stated and thus expressed. As maritime liens are recognised by law, persons who are allowed by those interested in a vessel to have possession of her, for the purpose of using or employing her in the ordinary manner, must be deemed to have received authority from those interested in her to subject the vessel to claims in respect of which maritime liens may attach to her arising out of matters occurring in the ordinary course of her use or employment, unless the parties have so acted towards each other that the party asserting the lien is not entitled to rely on such presumed authority. In my opinion, it is right in principle, and only reasonable, in order to secure prudent navigation, that third persons whose property is damaged by negligence in the navigation of a vessel by those in charge of her should not be deprived of the security of the vessel by arrangement between the persons interested in her and those in possession of her; and I consider that it is also right and reasonable that persons who have rendered services to a vessel, under circumstances which entitle them to treat her as owned by the persons in possession, should have the same rights against the vessel as if her real owners had been in possession. On the other hand, the persons interested in a vessel in placing her in the possession and control of other persons, to be used or employed in the ordinary way, must contemplate that claims may arise against her in respect of rights given by the maritime law, and if they choose to place her in these circumstances may be taken to have authorised those persons to subject the vessel to those claims.

According to the principle I have stated, claims arising in cases like The Druid (6), The Orient (9), and The Ida (10), cannot be enforced against the vessel, because they arise out of unlawful acts done without any authority and beyond anything which ought to be contemplated in the ordinary use of the vessel. And in cases like The Turgot (14) and The Castlegate (1) the persons dealing with the charterers have not been entitled to treat, nor have they treated, the vessel as owned by the charterers, but have dealt with them on their credit, and not upon the faith of having the security of the vessel. They have not, in fact, relied on any presumed authority derived from the owners. But in claims arising in cases like The Ticonderoga (11), The Ruby Queen (12), and The Lemington (7) the claims arose from acts occurring in the ordinary employment of the vessel in the manner authorised. With regard to the wages of masters and crews, apart from statute law, the same principles should apply, but, according to what LORD WATSON says in The Castlegate (1) the legislature has recognised the rule that the lien for them attaches independently of any personal obligation of the owners. Upon the proposition under consideration I may further observe that a maritime lien arises in cases of bottomry and respondentia, although the owners of the property are not personally liable. This is because the master is not authorised to make the owners of the property personally liable, and the lender makes his loan on the security of the property and not on the credit of the owners.

Lastly, as pointed out above, a maritime lien travels with the vessel into whose-soever possession it comes, so that an innocent purchaser of a ship may find his property subjected to claims which existed prior to the date of his purchase, unless the lien is lost by laches or the claim is one which may be barred by the statute of limitations. This rule is stated in The Bold Buccleugh (17) to be deduced from the civil law, and, although it may be hard on an innocent purchaser, if it did not exist a person who was owner at the time a lien attached could defeat the lien by transfer if he pleased.

The facts of the present case are stronger in favour of the lien than those in the charterers' cases, and render the case very similar to those of a mortgagee. The Ripon City had been delivered to Neil, McLean & Co., under the contract of November, 1895. Eight sixty-fourth shares were transferred to the buyers, and £1,000 was paid by them, but the remaining shares remained registered in the sellers' names, and when they were to be transferred a mortgage was to be given to secure the unpaid purchase money. So that practically the buyers were owners and the sellers were in a similar position to that of mortgagees in respect of the purchase-money remaining unpaid. The sellers allowed Neil, McLean & Co. to have the possession and control of the vessel, to hold themselves out to the plaintiff as managing owners of the vessel, to appoint him to command her, and to place him in a position in which he was entitled to make disbursements and incur liabilities on account of the ship. In the articles Neil, McLean & Co. were described as the managing owners, and I think that the plaintiff was clearly entitled A to treat, and did treat, them as managing owners. He had no notice of any facts which would deprive him of his right of lien, and, in my opinion, he was entitled to look to the ship as security for his claims in question. If this were not so, a master of a ship in the plaintiff's position would be subjected to great injustice.

He would be deprived of the security upon the faith of which he undoubtedly B acts. His position is entirely different from that of the master of the Castlegate, who incurred liabilities on behalf and on the credit of the charterers when he knew that the ship was not theirs, and that his owners had not authorised him to pledge their credit. I consider that the case falls within the principle I have endeavoured to arrive at, and I hold that the plaintiff had a maritime lien on the vessel for the amount of the bills.

[His LORDSHIP said that the third point, that the settlement is an answer to the C action, might be more shortly disposed of. The contention raised by the defendants was that Furness, Withy & Co. had no knowledge or notice of the document of Feb. 13, 1897, and Messrs. Cory's contention was that Furness, Withy & Co. had sufficient notice or knowledge of the arrangement between the plaintiff and Messrs. D Cory so that the settlement was fraudulent and void as against them. The learned judge referred to the evidence, and said that he was of the opinion that Furness, Withy & Co. had sufficient notice or knowledge of the facts to render the settlement void as against Messrs. Cory. He would enter judgment for the plaintiff against the defendants and their bail for the sum of £1,243 14s. 6d., the amount of the two bills, with interest at 4 per cent. per annum on the amount of the bills respectively calculated from their respective due dates, and costs.]

Order accordingly. E

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lindley, A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.), March 23, 1897]

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant—Covenant running with the land—Covenant H affecting use of demised premises—Benefit to lessor—Assigns of tenant not mentioned in covenant.

By a covenant in the lease of an hotel the lessee covenanted that he would not during the term created by the lease buy, receive, sell, or dispose of, in, upon, out of, or about the premises any wines or spirits other than should have been I bona fide supplied by or through the lessor (a wine and spirit merchant), his successors or assigns. By a proviso, so long as the lessee should well and truly observe the covenant, he was to be allowed an abatement from the rent reserved.

Held: notwithstanding the omission from the covenant of any mention of assignees of the tenant the burden of the covenant ran with the land so as to bind the tenant's assignees; furthermore, the proviso enured for the benefit of the assignees.

Per RIGBY, L.J.: Where you find a covenant of such a nature that it affects directly the use of the demised premises in a manner which the lessor chooses

A to assume will be beneficial to him, in accordance with general principles it ought to run with the land whether the word "assigns" is mentioned or not.

Appeal from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., on a summons to determine the true construction of a lease.

By an indenture of lease, dated June 13, 1882, and made between Sir Thomas White, who carried on the business of a wine and spirit merchant (thereinafter called "the lessor"), of the one part, and William Reeves Fuller (thereinafter called "the lessee"), of the other part, the lessor demised an hotel and premises known as the Royal Hotel, Southend-on-Sea, Essex, together with certain other premises to all of which the lessor was entitled in fee simple, unto the lessee for the term of thirty years at the yearly rent of £1,500 payable quarterly. The lease contained the usual covenant by the lessee with the lessor for payment of rent, and also a covenant as follows :

H "And the lessee doth hereby also covenant with the lessor, his heirs and assigns, that he, the lessee, shall not nor will during the term hereby granted buy, receive, sell, or dispose of, either directly or indirectly, nor suffer or permit to be bought, received, sold, or disposed of, either directly or indirectly, in, upon, out of, or about the said premises, or any part thereof, any foreign wines or any spirits, except gin, or other excisable liquors whatsoever, other than shall have been bona fide supplied by or through the lessor or his successors or successor, assigns or assign, provided the said person or persons shall be willing to supply the same, of good and proper quality, to the lessee at the fair current market price thereof."

The lease further contained the following proviso :

"Provided also, and it is hereby agreed and declared, that so long as the lessee shall well and truly observe the covenant on his part lastly hereinbefore contained not to buy, receive, sell, or dispose of, either directly or indirectly, nor suffer or permit to be bought, received, sold, or disposed of, either directly or indirectly, in, upon, out of, or about the said premises, or any part thereof, any foreign wines or any spirits, except gin, or other excisable liquors whatsoever, other than shall have been bona fide supplied by or through the lessor or his successors or successor, assigns or assign, in manner aforesaid, then the lessor will allow to the lessee an abatement of £75 from each quarterly payment of the rent hereinbefore reserved, but immediately upon any breach of the said covenant such abatement shall cease."

On Mar. 8, 1883, Sir Thomas White died, having by his will, dated Nov. 18, 1880, devised and bequeathed all his residuary real and personal estate, including the property at Southend, unto his trustees therein named, upon certain trusts, and appointed his trustees as his executors. Under an agreement, dated July 9, 1883, the executors and trustees sold the goodwill, stock and assets of the business of a wine and spirit merchant so carried on as aforesaid by Sir Thomas White to Thomas Curtis and Joseph John Curtis. The business was subsequently carried on under the name of "White and Price." In September, 1883, W. R. Fuller assigned the lease of the Royal Hotel and premises to the Southend Hotel Co., Ltd. The company having always obtained their wines and spirits from the firm of White and Price in accordance with the terms of the covenant in the lease, claimed that they were entitled as of right to a rebate of £75 from each quarter's rent. Sir Thomas White's executors and trustees, however, contended that, upon the ownership of the wine and spirit business and the ownership of the reversion to the freehold premises being severed, the covenant to purchase wines and spirits from Sir Thomas White, his successors or assigns, ceased to be operative, and, consequently, that the company were not entitled to the benefit of the proviso, and they took out an originating summons against the company asking whether, according to the true construction of the lease, and in the events which had happened, the defendants, as lessees under the lease, were now entitled to an abatement of £75 from each quarterly payment of rent reserved by such lease under the covenants and provisos in such lease contained, or from what date they had ceased to be entitled to such abatement.

On the hearing of the summons KEKEWICH, J., made a declaration that, according to the true construction of the lease, the defendants, as lessees under the said lease, are entitled to abatement of rent. The plaintiffs appealed.

Farwell, Q.C., and C. Lyttelton Chubb for the plaintiffs.

Eve, Q.C., and Martelli for the defendants.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In this case there is some little peculiarity, but I have come to the conclusion that the decision of the learned judge which is appealed from is right, although perhaps I should not quite put it in the same way that he did in his judgment. [His LORDSHIP read the covenants in the lease relating to the purchase of wines and spirits and the abatement from the rent of £75 a quarter, and continued:] The object of that covenant as to the purchase of wines and spirits is plain enough. It is indirectly to compel the lessee to get all his wines and spirits from the lessor or his successors in business, or his assigns, whatever that may mean.

The first question which appears to me to arise is whether the burden of this covenant runs with the tenant's interest under the lease,—in other words, whether it runs with the land. We have now a claim for rent (which I will come to presently) by the lessor's legal personal representatives against the assignees of the lessee, and the question we have to consider is whether, notwithstanding the omission of the word "assigns," the burden of this covenant runs with the tenant's interest so as to bind the assignees, even though not named. These questions are always a little troublesome and a little difficult; but, having regard to the authorities to which our attention has been called, and especially to such cases as Tatem v. Chaplin (1), Clegg v. Hands (2), and Fleetwood v. Hull (3), it appears to me that

A it is impossible to say that the tenant's assignees are not bound by this covenant. It is a covenant restraining, in fact, the lessee and his assigns (although not named) from using this property in the particular way which is designated. In the old language which we are accustomed to with reference to this matter, that is a covenant "touching the land." I think that that is plain, not only from what was said by this court in Clegg v. Hands (2)—where we had a somewhat different problem to solve—but also from the decision of CHARLES, J., in Fleetwood v. Hull (3), which contains a very full and careful investigation of what is meant by "touching the land." It appears to me, on those authorities, that this covenant touched the land, and that, consequently, the defendants are bound by it.

C Pausing here for a moment, I should state that the assignees are being sued, not by the purchasers of the wine and spirit business, because the purchasers of that business cannot maintain any action on this lease, but by the lessor's executors and trustees. The lessor's executors and trustees are in no worse position as regards this matter than the lessor himself, and I do not see an answer, at law or in equity, to an action brought by the executors and trustees against the defendants upon a breach of this covenant. Supposing there was, what the damages would be I do not know. I do not think it follows that they would be nominal, because, although I had not observed it until a comparatively late stage of the argument, the covenant is not to buy wines and spirits other than shall have been supplied "by or through the lessor." It might be that the lessor might say: "It is quite worth my while to buy spirits and sell them to you (the lessee)." It does not follow, to my mind, that the damages would be necessarily nominal; but, if they were, it does not appear to me to be material. What is material to see is whether an action would lie by the lessor and his legal personal representatives against the assignees of the lessee for breach of the covenant. I think that it would. If that is so, it throws a great deal of light upon the clause which we have to interpret, and which has given rise to this controversy.

F One must bear in mind that there was a covenant to pay a rent of £1,500 in addition to the covenant to which I have already alluded; and there is this proviso:

G "Provided also, and it is hereby agreed and declared, that so long as the lessee [which includes 'assigns,' as I have already endeavoured to show in commenting upon the provisions contained in the covenant] shall well and truly observe the covenant on his part lastly hereinbefore contained not to buy, receive, sell, or dispose of, either directly or indirectly, nor suffer or permit to be bought, received, sold, or disposed of, either directly or indirectly, in, upon, out of, or about the said premises, or any part thereof, any foreign wines or any spirits, except gin, or other excisable liquors whatsoever, other than shall have been bona fide supplied by or through the lessor, or his successors or successor, assigns or assign, in manner aforesaid, then the lessor will allow to the lessee an abatement of £75 from each quarterly payment of the rent hereinbefore reserved, but immediately upon any breach of the said covenant such abatement shall cease."

I What does that mean? That means that this is not a proviso for a set-off—that is to say, that it is not a proviso for setting off against the rent what the tenant will buy of the landlord, but that it is a proviso for abatement from the rent. When I come to look at the proviso, it appears to me that it enures for the benefit of the assignees, just as the burden of the covenant has to be borne by them.
